THE SHAKESPEARE KEY

UNLOCKING THE TREASURES OF HIS STYLE, ELUCIDATING THE PECULIARITIES OF HIS CONSTRUCTION, AND DISPLAYING THE BEAUTIES OF HIS EXPRESSION;

FORMING A COMPANION TO

"THE COMPLETE CONCORDANCE TO SHAKESPEARE"

BY

CHARLES & MARY COWDEN CLARKE,

AUTHORS OF "THE COMPLETE CONCORDANCE TO SHAKESPEARE," "SHAKESPEARE CHARACTERS," "THE GIRLHOOD OF SHAKESPEARE'S HEROINES," &c., &c., &c., &c.

"I will fitly bring you to hear my lord speak.
Pray you, go: there's my key."—Shakespeare.
"Who understandeth thee not, loves thee not."—Shakespeare.

A VOLUME that should present as ready a reference to the several features of Shakespeare's style as the Concordance presents to his every word, was long felt to be a need by the Authors of this work during their many years' editorial and critical devotion to Shakespeare's writings; and the accumulated result of their then jotted-down attempts to supply this need now takes carefully matured shape in "THE SHAKESPEARE KEY," which will thus become as useful to future Shakespearian students as it would formerly have been to themselves. It will in fact enable every reader of Shakespeare to become his own editor, elucidator, and interpreter, since it makes Shakespeare illustrate himself; containing, as it does, the means of at once turning to confirmatory evidences of the mode in which Shakespeare expresses his thoughts, thereby denoting and establishing the probably right reading of hitherto disputed passages, and placing collectively at one view comparative evidence which till now has been scattered in notes, glossaries, commentaries, &c., &c. For instance, it being shown by upwards of 300 assembled examples that Shakespeare uses many words, as well as the one in question, with largely inclusive or elliptical force, passages like the following—where the word "spare" has been suspected of error and been changed for various other substituted words—offer no obstacle to comprehension, but are in complete accordance with Shakespeare's style:—

"Showing, we would not spare Heaven, as we love it,
But as we stand in fear."—M. for M., ii. 3.

On the contrary, it is demonstrated that the original word should be retained; because, judging from other similarly employed words, there is every probability that in this passage he uses the verb "spare" so as to make the phrase elliptically express 'spare Heaven our offence,' 'refrain from offending Heaven.'

AN important heading of the present work has been devoted to Shakespeare's DRAMATIC TIME, showing by multitudinous carefully collected instances his own invented style and system in this particular.

THE mere enumeration of the various headings which form the "Table of Contents" to "The Shakespeare Key," will perhaps best suffice to show its nature, its minute detail, and its intrinsic utility as an exhaustive expositor of Shakespeare's style:—

NOT only to the philological student, the poet, the dramatist, the fiction-writer, the biographer, the historian, the author generally, the orator, the public speaker,—all persons whose object is to attain precision, strength, and refinement of expression,—will this book upon Shakespeare's style prove essentially valuable; but the most uncultivated boy or girl reader of our great Poet's works, who wishes to improve his or her diction and learn the best mode of uttering his or her thought in simplest yet noblest English, will, we trust, find help and advantage from "The Shakespeare Key."

MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Now ready.

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

BY WM. POLE, F.R.S., MUS. DOC.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem," published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

THE MENDELSSOHN FAMILY.

THE publication of a biography embracing three generations of a distinguished family, and containing records of the lives of every one of its numerous members during that period, appears at the first glance an undertaking so unique, and even in some respects hazardous, as to invite a preliminary inquiry into its raison d'être. We refer to the work just issued from the German press (Berlin: B. Behr's Buchhandlung, E. Bock) under the title of "Die Familie Mendelssohn," and from the pen of Herr S. Hensel, himself a member of the family he portrays. Turning to the prefatory remarks of the author, we meet with the following explanatory words regarding the origin of the volumes in question: "The work which I now hand over to the public," says Herr Hensel, "was originally undertaken for a different purpose, and under very different aspects. It was intended to be a biography, not only of the family, but for the family." This fact, then, while indicating the general treatment of the subject in hand, also accounts for an enormous quantity of family letters, extracts from diaries, &c., having been included in the work, the eminently domestic and private character of which, however interesting to those immediately concerned, cannot be expected to attract the curiosity of even the most prying general reader. Nor, we venture to assert, would the intellectual achievements of a Moses Mendelssohn, about whom so much has already been written, or the literary associations and social attainments of his gifted children, furnish in themselves adequate matter of interest to the present generation of readers to warrant the publication of this "Family Biography," were it not for the brilliant genius and the lovable individuality of the grandson of Moses, Felix, about whom the world can never know too much, and whose enduring popularity, at all events in this country, will ensure also to the records of his ancestry a full measure of sympathy. Since the first appearance in print of the delightful "Reisebriefe," a vast number of biographical details, anecdotes, and "personal recollections" concerning the composer of "Elijah" have been published, exposing his very private life to the public gaze, and while our favourable estimation of his character has gained by the inspection thus afforded, the demand for further information concerning him would seem to be still in advance of the supply. Such being the case, the step taken by Herr Hensel in presenting to the public a work originally compiled for the perusal of his family only needs no further justification. He must not be surprised, however, if the great majority of his readers will pass over entire chapters of the "Family Chronicle," while eagerly seizing upon those portions which may throw a fresh light upon the personality of the composer they revere. Nor will their expectations be altogether disappointed, and it is this phase of the work with which we are here chiefly concerned.

Moses Mendelssohn at once the founder of the family and of its fame, had entered Berlin in 1743, a poor deformed Jewish lad, but endowed with a heart full of noble aspirations, and an insatiable thirst after knowledge. It was these two qualities which supported his moral courage during years of self-denial, bordering upon abject poverty, which followed; it was they which, together with a remarkably clear intellect, eventually raised him to a foremost position among the philosophical minds of the eighteenth century. He became the intimate friend of Lessing, who, as is well known, reproduced and idealized the chief features of the individuality of Moses in his "Nathan the Wise." In the year 1783 he published his most important literary work, written in defence of Judaism and religious freedom, and entitled "Jerusalem," which will ever bear witness to his powers as a logician and great dialectic attainments. But his greatest merit consists in his having, by virtue of his own personality and untiring efforts, prepared the way for the emancipation throughout the kingdom of Prussia of his co-religionists from the social degradation in which they had hitherto been held. This indeed, together with his personal fame, was the priceless legacy which Moses Mendelssohn bestowed upon his children, and which subsequently enabled them to enfold, without official restraint, those various intellectual gifts which added brilliancy to the social and literary circles of Berlin during the first decades of the present century.

Moses had three daughters (of whom the eldest, Dorothea, is most generally known through her marriage with Friedrich Schlegel) and three sons, the second, Abraham, being destined to add fresh lustre to the family name in his son Felix. Abraham thus occupies a middle position between the two great representatives of the family, a fact which he humorously and modestly acknowledged in the words, "Formerly I was the son of my father, now I am the father of my son." And again, on another occasion, he says, "I have often chaffed myself about the fact of my standing between father and son as it were like a hyphen." But there can be no doubt that he was singularly qualified by nature to fill the difficult position in which he was placed, and the responsibilities of which he fully recognised. A banker by profession, he had inherited from the father a mind open to the influence of culture generally, together with liberal and tolerant views of life, while the combined firmness and gentleness of his character made his parental authority to be as cheerfully accepted on the part of his precocious children as it was unquestioned. Having satisfied himself of the reality of his son's genius, he directed his attention, with great practical wisdom, to the course of education to be pursued by him; and it is one of the chief elements of the future greatness of Felix that the various faculties of his mind had been suffered to develop harmoniously from an early age. Thus the self-styled "hyphen" between Moses and Felix becomes a metaphorical expression of no ordinary significance, and Abraham Mendelssohn may justly lay claim to no mean share in the fame of his son. Nor was he deficient in the keen appreciation of the specific art to which the latter devoted himself. "It is often quite inexplicable to me," says Felix in a letter to his father, "how it is possible, without being technically musical, to possess such an exact judgment of music, and if I could put into words what I feel in my music as clearly and comprehensively as you do, whenever you speak of it, I should never hold confused talk on the subject again in my life." And on another occasion, Fanny (Felix's favourite sister, and herself an accomplished musician,) expressed in similar terms her surprise at the father's acute judgment in musical matters. The sound artistic opinions held by Abraham, and the excellent practical advice with which, up to the time of his death, he accompanied the rapid onward career of his son, are, moreover, sufficiently well known through the publication of the "Mendelssohn Letters," and do not therefore require to be enlarged upon here. Consistent with the spirit of the age of social and religious "enlightenment" in which he had grown up, and the tolerant bias of which has been so admirably illustrated in the story of the "three rings" in Lessing's "Nathan," Abraham Mendelssohn decided upon having his children brought up in the Protestant faith, and it was in consequence of this step, Herr Hensel tells us, that he joined the name of his brother-in-law, Bartholdy, to his son, as a distinction from the other branches of the family. How thoroughly the composer of "St. Paul" and the resuscitator of Bach's "Passion Music" had imbibed the spirit of Protestantism, it is needless to point out.

Turning now to the portion of Herr Hensel's work specially referring to Felix, we meet with a considerable quantity of letters written by the composer to his family during different periods of his life, and the great majority of which are here published for the first time. That Mendelssohn was a virtuoso of letter-writing every amateur knows. He threw his whole individuality into his epistolary communications, and while abstaining on principle from the public criticism, so extensively practised by his friend Schumann, his letters are teeming with noteworthy observations and valuable suggestions concerning art and artists, which, if separately collected, would form a most instructive compendium to the musical student. Nor are the fresh-coloured vigour which distinguishes his descriptions of the society in which the writer moves, and his keen enjoyment of the grand aspects of nature, among the least charming characteristics of Mendelssohn's literary style; and these, as in the letters previously published, are again apparent in the volumes before us. So much of interest to the student of the composer's public career and private life is presented in this stage of Herr Hensel's "chronicle," that it is difficult to make a selection, and we must content ourselves with a few extracts taken at random. Passing over the earlier period of the artist's life, in which, among other more or less remarkable incidents, his oft-described visit to Goethe, at Weimar, has a conspicuous place, we find him in the year 1825 visiting Paris, for the first time, in company with his father. The French capital just then combined within its walls a brilliant array of musical artists, such as Cherubini, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Paër, Baillot, Moscheles, Hummel, Kalkbrenner, and many others. But the artistic atmosphere prevailing in those circles, and the general character of the place, were not at all to Felix's liking, greatly to the disappointment of his family, of whom the female members especially had a great predilection for everything French. Thus he writes, in reply to a letter from his sister Fanny: "You speak to me of prejudices and narrow-mindedness. . . . But reflect, I pray you, for a moment. Is it you who are in Paris, or is it I? Then I must be better acquainted with it than you are. Is it my way to be steeped in prejudice when judging of music? But even supposing such to be the case: Is Rode prejudiced when he says to me, 'C'est ici une dégringolade musicale.' Is Neukomm prejudiced, who tells me, 'Ce n'est pas ici le pays des orchestres'? Is Herz prejudiced in saying, 'The public here is only capable of comprehending and enjoying 'variations'? And are ten thousand others prejudiced who speak ill of Paris? No; it is you who are so much predisposed in favour of Paris that you believe my most impartial accounts less than the imaginary conception of it, as an Eldorado, which you have formed in your own mind. Look at the Constitutionnel. What do they perform at the Italian Opera except Rossini's works? Look over a music-catalogue. What is published—what will sell—except Romances and Potpourris? Only come here yourself, and hear 'Alceste,' hear 'Robin des Bois,' hear the soirées, hear the performances of the Royal Orchestra, and then judge." The "Robin des Bois" alluded to was Weber's maltreated "Freischütz" in its "arrangement" for the French stage. The letter just quoted is important in showing the strong bias of the lad of sixteen in favour of the serious aspects of his art. Another passage from a letter written about the same time may here find a place. Again addressing his alter-ego, Fanny, he says: "Only remember, dear child, that people here do not know a single note of 'Fidelio!' that they look upon Bach as an old wig stuffed with dry learning! I have played the 'Fidelio' overture to Onslow on a very wretched pianoforte, and he was in raptures, scratched his head, instrumentalised the whole in his mind, joined his voice with my playing towards the finish, and, in short, was quite mad. The other day I played, at Kalkbrenner's request, the Organ Preludes in E-and A-minor. They were pronounced to be 'sweetly pretty' by the audience, and one of them remarked that the commencement of that in A minor was exceedingly like a certain favourite duet from an opera by Montigny. My eyes began to see blue and green before them." Felix was never able to overcome the dislike of the musical life of the French capital he had contracted during this first visit. In marked contrast to this stand the impressions he received during his subsequent first stay (in 1829) in this country, where everything, even so undesirable a characteristic as our London fog, seemed to possess a peculiar charm for him. "It is dreadful! it is maddening!" he writes to his parents, "I am baffled and confused! London is the most grandiose, the most complicated monster on the face of the earth. How can I cram together in one letter what I have seen in three days? I can scarcely call to mind the main incidents, and yet I dare not keep a diary for fear of missing something in the meantime." He speaks with enthusiasm of Regent Street, of the crowded thoroughfares, of the life in the city, of the elegance and comfort he meets with, and, last not least, of the beauty of English ladies. On the other hand, the brilliant young artist was received on all sides with unmistakable signs of cordial sympathy and admiration; and no means were neglected on the part of his friends to make his stay an agreeable one in every way. Thus, the foundation was laid for the growing predilection of the composer for England; and this country has, in turn, manifested her gratitude by bestowing upon his works a degree of popularity greater even than that ever accorded to them in his own fatherland. From London, Felix made an excursion to Scotland, accompanied by his friend Klingemann; and the letters directed to his family on this occasion are full of lively descriptions of scenery and humorous adventures. It was here where he received the impressions afterwards laid down in some of his finest compositions.

In the year 1833 Felix came again to England; this time in the company of his father, whose matter-of-fact view of things around him forms an amusing contrast to the enthusiastic ways of the son. "This morning at fourteen minutes past nine," writes Abraham in humorous allusion to the latter, "the sun was just powerful enough to give a yellow tinge to the fog. . . . 'A very fine morning,' said my barber to me. 'Is it?' I asked; and thus I learnt what is meant here by a fine summer morning. . . . Felix is playing the organ at St. Paul's, but I cannot make up my mind to leave the room; when he comes back no doubt he will vow that nowhere are there such beautiful summer days to be met with as in London." In the spring of 1837, Felix was married to Cecile Jeanrenaud, whose acquaintance he had made during a short residence at Frankfort; and in the autumn of the same year we find him again in England conducting his "St. Paul" at a memorable Birmingham Festival, and receiving such ovations on all sides that, according to his expression, "one needed some fish-blood to prevent one bursting." He was approaching the zenith of his popularity, and the wonder is that the excess of homage and adulation offered him did not in any way affect that sweet simplicity of his nature which is breathed throughout in the letters he wrote to his family till the last. In October, 1843, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's music, was performed for the first time with immense success at Berlin, and we will conclude our reference to Felix's correspondence with an extract from a letter he wrote soon after that event from Leipzig to his sister Rebecka (or, as he familiarly called her, "Beckchen"), then staying at Rome: "My recent stay at Berlin has been a most fatiguing time for me. I had to conduct eleven long rehearsals and four performances in a fortnight . . . and I have hardly anything to talk about except hautbois and trumpets, and they cut but a poor figure in a tale. Twelve numbers there are in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the funeral music at Thisbe's death is quite in the manner of my preludes, which have so frequently induced you to a laugh. It is executed by a clarinet, a bassoon, and a drum, but, as already said, it is not easy to put such things into words. Let us hope I shall be able to play it to you in Rhenish Bavaria next summer! . . . I assure you that I have specially regretted your absence during every rehearsal and every performance. It would have been so exactly to your taste, and you would have heartily rejoiced with me at the successful parts, and been angry with me at what went wrong. It is amusing, however, that the Berlin folks are so much surprised and delighted at our old favourite piece of William's; yesterday they gave it there for the seventh time during ten days, and in the morning no tickets are to be obtained anywhere."

Among the remaining letters of different members of the "Mendelssohn Family" which have found a place in these volumes, those written by Fanny are perhaps the most interesting and attractive. She had been the companion of Felix in his earlier studies, and followed his brilliant career, as her letters show, with the intelligent appreciation of an artist as well as with the pride and devotion of a sister. Her death, which occurred in 1847, preceded that of the composer of "Elijah" but by a few months. With these two events the family chronicle closes, and in taking leave of a subject which cannot fail to prove attractive to every English amateur, we will express a hope that in the shortly to be expected English translation of the book the editor will find it advisable to omit such letters and details as can possess no public interest whatever, and which, while forming in the aggregate a conspicuous portion of the entire work, only serve to encumber its otherwise most interesting contents.

COLLECTIONS OF CHANTS

By the Rev. Henry Parr.

Very little has been printed on the Bibliography of Anglican Chants, and that little is not very correct.

Thinking that it might interest some readers to take a chronological view of the principal sources whence our standard Chants are derived, the writer has drawn up a list of the books by which he has mainly worked himself, and which, save three, are on his own shelves.

Very few Chants were published in the seventeenth century. Some of the earliest are in the Rev. John Barnard's "First Book of Selected Church Musick," 1641; E. Lowe's "Directions for the Performance of Cathedral Service," 1664; and the Rev. James Clifford's "Divine Services and Anthems," 1664. All these are Single, and are chiefly harmonised Gregorians.

Appended to the seventh edition of J. Playford's "Introduction to the Skill of Musick," 1674, is "The Order of Performing the Divine Service in Cathedrals and Collegiate Chappels." At p. 4 we have the heading, "These six Tunes are sung in His Majesties Chappel with the Organ to the Psalms, Te Deum, &c. Composed by Mr. John Blow and Mr. William Turner, Gentlemen of His Majesties Chappel." Among the six is that by Dr. Blow in E minor, and that by Dr. Turner in A, which have found places in almost every collection.

With the eighteenth century came a great increase in Chant-music. Double Chants now began to be written. Two of these are found in the Aldrich MSS. at Oxford, assigned respectively to Dr. Turner and B. Isaac. The well-known specimens by W. Morley in D minor, and Rev. L. Flintoft in G minor, were composed about this time, and no doubt came into use in our cathedrals, but were not printed for many years after.

In 1752 appeared "Divine Harmony; or a Collection of fifty-five Double and Single Chants, for Four Voices, As they are Sung at the Cathedral of Lichfield; Compos'd by John Alcock, Organist, Vicar, and Master of the Children of that Cathedral." 8vo.

These are noted in crotchets, and the inner parts are remarkable for their elegance and variety. No. 21 (Single) has been often printed, and has had the ill-luck to be often wrongly assigned, being given to Dr. Aldrich, Hine, and Fussell. It has also been damaged by transposition from C to B flat, and by striking out the appoggiatura in the third measure.*

The first volume of Dr. Boyce's "Cathedral Music," 1760, gives fourteen Chants, most of which are printed for the first time. They have a heavy and awkward appearance, being noted in semibreves. The last is the well-known Double, by J. Robinson, in E flat, which is said to have been a special favourite of George III.

Shortly after appeared "Fifty Double and Single Chants, being the most Favorite as Performed at St. Paul's, Westminster and most of the Cathedrals in England." Printed for C. and S. Thompson. 8vo. Dr. Rimbault styled this "The first printed Collection of Chants," and suggested 1740 as the approximate date (Notes and Queries, June 1, 1867). But the book contains three Chants by Battishill, designated "Organist of Christchurch." In 1740 he was only about two years old. There is also one by S. Porter, who at that time was only seven. Besides, Robinson's Chant is attributed to Dr. Boyce, and has the same parts, note for note, as those in his "Cathedral Music," which clearly indicates that it was taken from that work. Thus it would seem that Thompson's Collection can hardly be earlier than 1765. In this we meet with Rev. P. Henley in E, Rev. E. Gregory in E flat, and a pleasing Chant in E flat commonly ascribed to Dr. Alcock, but here assigned to "Mr. Alcock, jun., M.B." This description would not suit the doctor at the above date; it must refer to his son, who was Organist of Walsall about 1770.

* Compilers seem determined to rob Dr. Alcock of his composition. When Dr. Wesley was at work on "The European Psalmist," he consulted the writer on various points as they arose. Among other things he inquired as to the authorship of this Chant. He was told that the writer had the original, and was given such particulars as it was thought must be satisfactory. But when his work came out there was the old blunder again—"Hine, c. 1729."

In 1767 John Wainwright, Organist of the Collegiate Church, Manchester, published an original work styled "A Collection of Psalm Tunes, Anthems, Hymns, and Chants." Oblong folio. It contains six Chants, some of which have been reprinted up to recent times.*

An important compilation by T. Vandernan appeared in 1770, entitled "Divine Harmony: Being a Collection of Two Hundred and Seven Double and Single Chants." Here we first meet with a number of compositions by Travers, Weldon, Battishill, Bellamy, Dupuis, &c.; and there are no fewer than thirty-two by Vandernan himself.

A little after this Dr. Woodward, of Dublin, published his original "Cathedral Music," in folio, which contains eleven Chants. Of the Doubles, that in B flat and that in D are well known. There is also one in C, which has been commonly ascribed to T. Ebdon.

Richard Langdon, of Exeter, edited "Divine Harmony; being a Collection in Score of Psalms and Anthems." 1774; folio. At the end are twenty Chants by various authors, all given anonymously. The first, a Double in F, has usually been considered to be Langdon's own, and has long been popular. The inner parts, as given by Bennett and Marshall, are very pleasing.

Thomas Jackson, Organist of Newark-upon-Trent, published "Twelve Psalm Tunes and Eighteen Double and Single Chants. . . . Composed for Four Voices." An advertisement attached bears date 1780. Oblong quarto. Copies of this are not common, but one is with Mr. Joule, of Southport, and the writer possesses another. The Chants are very good, and were popular in the North of England in former years. Several are preserved in the Collections by Joule and Parr, as well as in Dr. Rimbault's, but are wrongly attributed in the last work.

A notable book of Originals came out in 1785, viz., "Sixty Chants Single and Double, Composed by John Jones, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral." Oblong 8vo. Among these is an arrangement of the "Grand Chant" as a Double for six voices. Another, unison in D, No. 24, possesses historic interest. It was performed, April 23, 1789, when George III. went in state to St. Paul's to return thanks for his restoration to health and reason. For many years it was constantly used at the annual meetings of the charity children in the Cathedral, and at the anniversary of 1791 was heard by Haydn, who was so pleased with it that he noted it down, suggesting a slight alteration in the last strain, and afterwards said, "This simple and natural air gave me the greatest pleasure I ever received from the performance of music."

John Stafford Smith published "Twelve Chants, Composed for the Use of the Choirs of the Church of England." Oblong 4to. The first is in triple time, and is the earliest instance the writer has noticed in that style.

Dr. Dupuis issued three original sets, viz.:—

"Sixteen Double and Single Chants, as performed at The Chapel Royal, &c., &c." Small oblong. The first Chant is a beautiful and well-known Double in B flat, which has suffered by being brought down to A in most collections.

"A Second Set of Chants, Composed for the Use of His Majesty's Chapel." Same size as the preceding. This contains ten Doubles and two Singles.

"Twenty-four Double and Single Chants, as performed at the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, &c." Oblong 4to. This includes the first set of sixteen, except two. The author is described as "Mus. Doc." on the title of the third set, but not on the others. This puts the date of that volume subsequent to 1790.

The Rev. Ralph Harrison, of Manchester, edited a large collection of Psalm-tunes, &c., styled "Sacred Harmony," which was long the authority in the North of England. It appeared in two volumes, oblong 4to, the first published in 1786, the second about 1792. In the latter are seventy-two Chants, including many by Alcock, Jackson, &c.

Thomas Ebdon, of Durham, published two folio volumes of original "Sacred Music in Score." At the end of each is a page of Chants not distinguished by originality.

Matthew Camidge, Organist of York Minster, brought out an original book of "Cathedral Music," folio, which includes "Thirty Chaunts, Single and Double." Two of the Doubles, A unison and D unison, were long popular.

Many years after Camidge published "Twenty-four Original Psalm and Hymn Tunes," to which "The Author has subjoined Twenty-four of his own Double Chants, never before published." The volume is 8vo.

In 1795 appeared "Sixty Chants, Single & Double; also Twelve Sanctus's in Score, compos'd by the Choirsters of St. Paul's Cathedral." Oblong 8vo.

"Twenty Double Chants, Composed by Joseph Kemp, Opera III.," came out early in the present century.* Oblong 8vo, or 12mo. Three of these are in triple time.

A well-known collection by Dr. Beckwith appeared in 1808, entitled "The First Verse of every Psalm of David, with an Ancient or Modern Chant in Score." Folio. This contains a great many by the compiler. The harmony is not good.

John Marsh, the celebrated amateur of Chichester, published "Twenty-four new Chants in four parts." Oblong 4to.

He also edited "The Cathedral Chant Book. Being a Collection of near Two Hundred of the most popular and approved Ancient and Modern Chants." Oblong 4to. This is a valuable work, and reliable in the main. It has compositions by Jackson of Exeter, Attwood, Russell, and others, which are printed for the first time.

"Dr. Camidge's Chants, as used in York Cathedral," were published in folio, being a portion of his original "Cathedral Music." They are sixty in number, all Double. Among them is one in E, printed in various collections anonymously as "York Chant." Dr. Rimbault, in his "Family Chant Book," wrongly assigned it to Thomas Wanless, Mus. Bac.

Dr. J. Clarke, afterwards Clarke-Whitfeld, edited "A Selection of Single & Double Chants, with Kyrie eleeson, Sanctusses, &c., Ancient and Modern, in Score." Two volumes, oblong 4to. This contains fifty-six Singles and fifty-one Doubles.

"A Collection of Chants as Used at Christ Church Cathedral and St. John's College Chapel, Oxford," was edited by William Cross, Organist of Christ Church, &c. Oblong 4to. It is but a poor affair, justifying Mr. Havergal's remark: "Cross was a good organist, but no musician."

George Cleland, Organist of St. Mary's Chapel, Bath, edited "A Selection of Chants, never before published. Together with a Sanctus and Kyrie eleison." 1823; oblong 4to. This gives some good compositions by Dr. Pring, Spofforth, &c.

* J. Wainwright left many other Chants in MS., which are now in the writer's possession. Some of them were printed for the first time in Parr's "Psalmody."

* It must have been before 1808. Dr. Kemp graduated Mus. Bac., Cantab., 1808, and Mus. Doc. 1809.

Thomas Hallwood, Conductor of the Choir at St. Peter's, Liverpool, about 1820 published an original work, "Fifty Psalm and Forty Chant Tunes. Sett for Four Voices." Oblong folio, Several of these had a local popularity within the writer's recollection.

"Cathedral Music, in Score, Composed by Mr. Samuel Porter, late Organist of the Cathedral of Canterbury," was published after the author's death by his son, the Rev. W. J. Porter. Folio. It contains nine Chants.

"Chants, Single and Double, with a Sanctus," was published by the author, the Rev. C. I. Smyth, Minor Canon of Norwich. Oblong 4to. It contains fifteen Chants.

Michael Maybrick, Organist of St. Peter's, Liverpool, published many original Chants, and seems to have originated the Quadruple species.* His first set appeared in 1825 as "A Collection of Chants Composed and Arranged for Four Voices." Oblong 4to. This contains two Quadruples, twenty-eight Doubles, and eleven Singles.

His second set came out about 1838 as "A Collection of Quadruple, Double, & Single Chants, Responses, Gloria Patris, &c." Oblong 4to. It gives eight Quadruples, twenty Doubles, and twelve Singles. Each of the Quadruples has a Single in similar style, designed for the "Jubilate."

The Rev. R. P. Buddicom, Incumbent of Everton, Liverpool, formed a selection of music for his church in 1827 styled "One Hundred Psalm & Hymn Tunes with Chants . . . For the Organ or Piano Forte." Oblong 4to. The musical editor was C. H. Wilton, a well-known local musician. It contains thirty-eight Chants, four by Wilton himself. Among the others is an authentic copy of an elegant Double in E by James Salmon, of Liverpool (husband of the celebrated vocalist), which has been misrepresented and misattributed in a marvellous manner. The worst version of all is that in Goss's Collection, No. 159, where it is ascribed to Coombs. The true form is repeated in Parr's "Psalmody."

We now come to the grand Oxford Collection, which appeared in 1829 as "Cathedral Chants. Edited by Alfred Bennett, Mus. Bac. . . . and William Marshall, Mus. Bac. . . ." Folio. This contains forty-nine Singles and a hundred and eighty-two Doubles. The old Chants are given with great fidelity, and the harmony, where it is the editors', is classical. Many of the new compositions, by Jacobs, West, Woodgate, &c., are very beautiful. There are eleven originals by Bennett, and ten by Marshall. Prefixed are Memoirs of the Composers. This book is greatly superior to its predecessors, and has not been equalled by its successors.

"The Liverpool Chant Book. A Collection of Original Chants, Arranged for Four Voices," was edited by Edward Woodward, of Liverpool, in 1835. Oblong 4to. It contains sixty-eight Chants, contributed by twenty-five local organists and musicians.

"An Evening Service, and a Hundred Antiphonal Chants, Composed by the Rev. W. H. Havergal, A.M.," appeared in 1836. Folio. Many of these Chants are very pleasing, and some very ingenious; but their author lived to be ashamed of their style as too florid. There are some useful introductory remarks.

"A Collection of Chants, Sanctuses, and Responses," edited by William Hawes, came out in numbers about 1836. Folio. It contains a hundred and forty-four Chants.

J. M. Coombs, the younger, Organist of Chippenham, brought out "A Collection of Sacred Music," in folio, about 1835. It contains fifty-one new Chants by J. W. Windsor, W. Linley, Rev. O. T. Linley, T. Field, Rev. G. Mullins, Rev. C. Hoyle, and others, besides Coombs himself. Many of these are very good.

"Chants, Ancient and Modern, in Score," edited by John Goss, appeared in 1841. Folio. This contains two hundred and fifty-one compositions, including several old ones not in Bennett and Marshall. But the new contributions are every way inferior to those in the other work, and the arrangement of some standard ones is much less satisfactory.*

Dr. Crotch published "A Collection of Single and Double Chants," composed and arranged by himself. 1842; oblong 4to. This contains seventy-four pieces, many of which had appeared in earlier collections. Those which the Doctor arranged for Bennett and Marshall are here given with more or less difference in the harmony, and the alterations do not seem to be improvements.

Dr. Rimbault edited "Cathedral Chants of the XVI., XVII., & XVIII Centuries." 1844; 4to. This is a very beautiful volume and, as a library book, leaves nothing to be desired; but it has some considerable errors. Among the biographies we read of "— Wainwright, a composer of glees about 1790." The person intended was John Wainwright, who died 1768; the "composer of glees" was his son. There is a memoir of W. Jackson, of Exeter, though the book contains nothing by him; the Chants bearing his name are by T. Jackson, of Newark, of whom Rimbault, like his friend Dibdin, was profoundly ignorant. The name "Humphrey" is spelled "Humphries"—a vulgarism which should not have dropped from the pen of a learned and elegant antiquary. At No. 24 Dr. Alcock is robbed to give to Dr. Aldrich Nos. 25 and 29 are the same Chant, though assigned to two different composers! No. 23, by Dr. Turner, is wrongly attributed to Dr. Aldrich, and in the fifth measure has a fourth to the bass, of which neither of those authors was ever guilty. Many other slips might be noted, but the above may suffice to show that the Doctor's book is not entitled to the confidence which might seem due to his reputation.

"The Chanter's Hand-Guide . . . with Three Hundred and Seventy-three Cathedral Chants . . . Edited by Joseph Warren," appeared in 1850. 4to. This is an important collection. Mr. Warren had the honesty and modesty to allow the old Chants to stand as they were already known, and many new ones were contributed. But he refers some to original sources which had been in print long before. Thus, on pp. 57 and 98 are Chants by Dr. Pring stated to be "now first published." They were printed in Woodward's "Liverpool Chant Book" about 1835. So Salmon in E, which he calls "Bath Chant," on page 49 is said to be "now first published from a MS. in the editor's possession." But it had appeared, with some variation, in at least six earlier collections.

It is not within the design of this article to enumerate publications of a later date. Their name is "legion," and it is a duty to warn the student against placing reliance on their representations. Let him never accept a modern copy of a Chant without inquiry as to its origin. The above catalogue may assist him in the search after truth.

* Maybrick intended his Quadruples for the "Te Deum." The form may be open to criticism, but is surely preferable to the absurd jumble of Single Chants inflicted nowadays on some congregations as a "Chant Service." Anything must be better than that.

* A comparison of the parts to Boyce, No. 49, Langdon, No. 58, Randall, No. 75, and Jolly, No. 150, Bennett and Marshall, with those in the above work, will justify this observation.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 257).

LAST month we left Mendelssohn in Rome, delighted with the country and the people and the atmosphere of art which, however tainted by modern decadence, was to him as the breath of life. In Rome we now rejoin the young musician at a moment (February 8, 1831) when the sun is brightly shining, and all things speak of happiness and joy. The Eternal City still appears to Mendelssohn as an enchantment. "Oh! that I could enclose for you in this letter," he exclaims, "only one quarter of an hour of all this pleasure, or tell you how life actually flies in Rome, every minute bringing its own memorable delights! It is not difficult to give fêtes here. If the simple architectural outlines are lighted up, the dome of St. Peter's blazes forth in the dark purple atmosphere, calmly shining. If there are fireworks, they brighten the gloomy solid walls of the Castle of St. Angelo, and fall into the Tiber. When they commence their fantastic fêtes in February, the most lustrous sun shines down upon them and beautifies them. It is a wondrous land." But all this new experience and this protracted dwelling in the shadow of the gigantic past seems to have made, in one respect at any rate, no change in Mendelssohn. He remained as self-conscious as ever. We have seen how, on setting out from home, he fancied himself the object of everybody's envy; and how, on entering Italy, he was the Prince and the whole land en fête in his honour. So at Rome, where, because the solemnities incident upon the election of a new Pope coincided with his birthday, the young master took them all to himself. It may be said that this was done in joke; to which the only possible reply is that nobody supposes it to have been done in earnest. But a jest is as indicative of character as a serious action, and the fact must not be overlooked that, in the midst of grave historic events, the thought (sportively) occurred to Mendelssohn, "All this on my account." The second of February witnessed the proclamation of the new Pope. "All the bells in Rome were ringing," said our master, "and there was firing of cannons, and flourishes of trumpets and military music. This was the eve of my birthday." On the morrow Gregory XVI. went to St. Peter's, and Mendelssohn went also. "I followed the crowd down the long street to the Piazza, which looked finer than I had ever seen it, lit up brightly by the sun, and swarming with carriages, the Cardinals in their red coaches driving in state to the sacristy, with servants in embroidered liveries, and people innumerable, of every nation, rank, and condition, and high above them the dome and church seeming to float in blue vapour. And I thought that Capellari (the Pope) would appropriate all this to himself when he saw it, but I knew better. It was all to celebrate my birthday, and the election of the Pope and the homage was a spectacle got up in my honour." Further on we read more in the same strain: "The following day they worked very hard at scaffoldings, platforms, and stages for the Carnival; notices were posted up about the horse-races, and specimens of masks were displayed at the windows, and (in celebration of the day following my birthday) the illumination of the Dome and the Girandola were fixed for Sunday." Cannot we see through all this imaginativeness into the soul of the writer? To me it is clear enough that though the Pope was a great man in the capital of the Papacy, there was a good-looking young fellow from the banks of the Spree who secretly thought himself a greater.

Within a month from the date of the Roman festivities, the chronic tyranny of Papal government was protested against by an outbreak at Bologna. Then followed a sort of "reign of terror" in Rome, to which Mendelssohn referred in very guarded language, out of respect, perhaps, for the inquisitive habits of the Holy Father's post-office. We know that at the time Rome was held down and half-strangled by soldiers, police, and savage peasants imported from the Campagna; but the cautious German musician only permitted himself to say: "Rome is considerably changed, and neither so gay nor so cheerful as formerly. Almost all my acquaintances are gone; the promenades and streets are deserted, the galleries closed, and it is impossible to gain admittance into them. News from without almost entirely fails us (for we saw the details about Bologna first in the Allgemeine Zeitung yesterday); people seldom or never congregate together; in fact, everything has subsided into entire rest." By the way the expression "entire rest," applied to the state of Rome in March, 1831, suggests that Mendelssohn would have made an admirable diplomatist. It must have caused the face of the Pope's head-policeman—who doubtless read the letter—to relax into a grim smile. How far he sympathised, if at all, with the Italian revolutionists Mendelssohn by no means allowed to appear. Still, there is reason to believe that he was on their side, and some of it may be found in his remarks on the behaviour of the German painters, who took very decided precautions against danger: "The German painters are really more contemptible than I can tell you. Not only have they cut off their whiskers and moustaches, and their long hair and beards, openly declaring that as soon as all danger is at an end they will let them grow again, but these tall, stalwart fellows go home as soon as it is dark, lock themselves in, and croak in solitude. They call Horace Vernet a braggart, and indeed he is very different from these pitiful fellows, whose conduct at this time makes them intolerable to me." All this as a pose is highly effective, no doubt; but there is something to be said for the painters, who, though living in Rome, did not care to be treated as Romans. The sacrifice of one beard lasts only till another grows, and the dungeons of St. Angelo were neither discriminating as to nationality nor prompt to disgorge their prey. It is probable, therefore, that Mendelssohn's countrymen, if they knew anything of his cheap heroics, treated them very lightly.

Our master was a close and interested observer of the magnificent rites incident to Holy Week, and sent home full and glowing descriptions not only of their character, but of their effect upon himself. Here we come upon a striking example of the precocious ripeness of Mendelssohn's intellect. Most other young men of twenty-one would have admired this and laughed at that, according as the fancy struck them, taking only the partial and superficial view incident to youth. But Mendelssohn approached the matter like a philosopher. He looked at the Roman Holy Week with an all-embracing eye, that is to say, he judged the show by its ensemble, and the religious ceremony by its impressions, not inquiring, in the one case, as to the fitness of every detail; nor, in the other, as to the absolute verity of every rite and article of belief. His own words deserve quotation, inasmuch as they give us a clear and pleasant view of the young master's judicial mind: "People have often both zealously praised and censured the ceremonies of Holy Week, and have yet omitted, as is often the case, the chief point—namely, its perfection as a complete whole. . . . Many others have given the mere music and been dissatisfied, because external adjuncts are required to produce the full effect. Those persons may be in the right; still, so long as these indispensable externals are there, and especially in such entire perfection, so long will it impress others; and just as I feel convinced that place, time, order, the vast crowd of human beings awaiting in the most profound silence the moment for the music to begin, all contribute largely to the effect, so do I condemn the idea of deliberately separating what ought in fact to be indivisible in order to hold up a certain portion to depreciation. That man must indeed be unhappy on whom the devotion and reverence of a vast assemblage do not produce a corresponding impression of devotion and reverence, even though they were worshipping the Golden Calf; let him alone destroy this who can replace it by something better. It matters not whether one person repeats it from another, whether it arise from its established reputation, or whether it be merely the effect of imagination. It suffices that we have a perfect totality which has exercised the most powerful influence for centuries past, and still exercises it, and therefore I reverence it, as I do every species of real perfection. I leave it to theologians to pronounce on its religious influence, for mere conjectures on that point are of no great value. There is more to be considered than the mere ceremonies. For me it is sufficient, as already said, that in any sphere the object should be fully carried out, so far as ability will permit, with fidelity and conscientiousness, to call forth my respect and appreciation. Thus, you must not expect from me a formal critique on the singing, as to whether they intoned correctly or incorrectly, in tune or out of tune, or whether the compositions are fine. I would rather strive to show you how the whole thing cannot fail to make a solemn impression, and how each detail contributes to this result, and as last week I enjoyed music, forms, and ceremonies, without severing them, revelling in the perfect whole, so I do not intend to separate them in this letter." It is impossible to overlook the fairness and wisdom of these remarks, coming as they do from one who was neither religiously nor intellectually in accord with the subject. That Mendelssohn's highly emotional nature was deeply touched seems clear enough. The spectacle and its associations moved him to the bottom of his soul, and one can almost see him struggling to repress rhapsody when writing to his friends at home, upon whom perhaps high-flown expressions would have had an uneasy effect. But he cannot prevent our seeing all the eagerness and delight with which he followed the various acts of the great ecclesiastical drama. Day after day he witnessed, so to speak, the rise of the curtain, and, despite hunger, thirst, and fatigue, he saw also its fall, even then retaining enough energy to "follow the Cardinals home." On one occasion he shows himself to us in the church. Where, does the reader think? Why, on the top of a ladder, which he had climbed, as Zaccheus climbed the fig-tree centuries before. Here are his words: "I must not forget to tell you that on the Thursday, when the 'Miserere' was about to begin, I clambered up a ladder leaning against the wall, and was thus placed close to the roof of the chapel, so that I had the music, the priests, and the people far beneath me in gloom and shadow. Seated thus alone, without the vicinity of any obtrusive stranger, the impression made on me was very profound." Cannot we picture that bright, eager face gleaming, "as it had been the face of an angel," from among the shadows high up in the sacred fane?

In the midst of all his rapture, Mendelssohn did not forget to be critical, and his letter to Zelter describing the Holy Week music is an admirable example of discriminating judgment. It serves, moreover, to give us an insight into the young master's opinions on some matters still debated with interest. For example, we see him out of all patience with the traditional ancient and venerable manner in which the Psalms were chanted: "I cannot help it, but I own it does irritate me to hear such holy and touching words sung to such insignificant and dull music. They say it is canto fermo, Gregorian, &c.; no matter. If at that period there was neither the feeling nor the capacity to write in a different style, at all events we have now the power to do so, and certainly this mechanical monotony is not to be found in the scriptural words. They are all truth and freshness, and, moreover, expressed in the most simple and natural manner. Why then make them sound like a mere formula? and in truth such singing as this is nothing more. The word 'Pater' with a little flourish, the 'meum' with a little shake, the 'ut quid me'—can this be called sacred music? There is certainly no false expression in it, because there is none of any kind, but does not this very fact prove the desecration of the words? A hundred times during the ceremony I was driven wild by such things as these; and then came people in a state of ecstasy, saying how splendid it had been. This sounded to me like a bad joke, and yet they were quite in earnest." We can gather from the foregoing how impatient Mendelssohn's fresh young mind was of the fossils of ecclesiastical music, but it will repay us to look further, and learn his opinion upon the Catholic rendering of the "Passion"—that curious division of the sacred narrative among three priests and a choir, from which results a something that is neither story nor drama. "'The Passion from St. John' was sung, composed by Vittoria, but the words of the people in the chorus alone are his, the rest are chanted according to an established formula whereof anon. The whole appeared to me too trivial and monotonous. I was quite out of humour, and, in fact, dissatisfied with the affair altogether. One of the two following modes ought to be adopted. The 'Passion' ought either to be recited quietly by the priest, as St. John relates it, in which case there is no occasion for the chorus to sing 'Crucifige eum,' nor for the alto to represent Pilate; or else the scene should be so thoroughly realised, that it ought to make me feel as if I were actually present, and saw it all myself. In that case Pilate should sing just as he would have spoken, and the chorus should shout out 'Crucifige' in a tone anything but reverent; but then by its absolute truthfulness and the subject it represents, such singing becomes sacred music. In such case I require no undercurrent of thought when I hear music, which to me is not, as they style it here, 'a means of exciting devotion,' but a distinct language, speaking plainly to me, and the sense is expressed by and contained in the words. This is the case with the 'Passion' of Sebastian Bach; but as they sing it here it is very imperfect, being neither a simple narrative, nor yet a grand solemn dramatic truth. The chorus sings 'Barabbam' to the same sacred chords as 'et in terra pax.' Pilate speaks exactly in the same manner as the Evangelist, and if the voice that represents our blessed Saviour commences always piano, in order to have one definite distinction, yet when the chorus breaks loose, shouting out their sacred chords, it seems entirely devoid of meaning." It is interesting, seeing what the writer afterwards became, to note this protest of revolutionary youth against conservative age. Mendelssohn here represents one of the two great forces whose resultant is humanity and human things as we find them. But it is probable that, albeit a philosopher, he gave no due weight to the consideration that the Christian church must not be judged by theories which determine and regulate ordinary progress. As a rule, national and social institutions move from rude beginnings to perfected endings. Their halcyon days lie in the future, whereas it is to the past that the Church looks for its model; every rite and doctrine being valued according to its antiquity and its nearness to the time when the first rays of the "Sun of Righteousness" lit up the earth. It is of no use, therefore, for Mendelssohn or any other to judge the ancient music of the Church by ordinary standards. It may be uncouth and even barbarous in comparison with modern art, but it comes down through the ages from the Saints and Fathers, and that is enough for reverent acceptance and jealous conservation.

From Rome, Mendelssohn went to Naples, and did the usual round of sight-seeing, as well as some work on his "Walpurgis-Night" and "Italian" symphony; the slow movement of which was written in the shadow of Vesuvius. The master's Neapolitan letters are graphic and interesting sketches, but, as they throw little light upon his character, this is no place to examine them. In June (having left Rome in April) Mendelssohn went back to the Eternal City, and there wrote an epistle to his parents full of the gravity and thoughtfulness with which he knew so well how to placate those stern if loving censors. Some observations in this document are worth noting. For instance, comparing, or rather contrasting, Rome and Naples, he said: "I cannot express how infinitely better I love Rome than Naples. People allege that Rome is monotonous, of one uniform hue, melancholy, solitary. It is certainly true that Naples is more like a great European city, more lively, more varied, and more cosmopolitan, but I may say to you confidentially that I begin gradually to feel the most decided hatred of all that is cosmopolitan; I dislike it just as I dislike versatility, which moreover I rather think I do not much believe in. Anything that aspires to be distinguished, or beautiful, or really great, must be one-sided, but then this one side must be brought to a state of the most consummate perfection, and no man can deny that such is the case at Rome." Considering how versatile Mendelssohn himself was, and the pains his father had taken to make of him an Admirable Crichton, the words just quoted have a significance other than appears on the surface. At twenty-one Mendelssohn was beginning to learn that supremacy belongs to the man of one pursuit, and that every branch of knowledge and form of labour is so exigent as to refuse distinction where the candidate does not serve it with all his heart and soul, and mind and strength. In the same letter Mendelssohn gives a personal experience by way of accounting for the incurable laziness of the Neapolitans. He could not work in Naples. "Everything inspired me with a wish to be idle, and to lounge about and sleep; yet I was constantly saying to myself that this was wrong, and striving to occupy myself and to work, which I could not accomplish." The master's usually active mind could not comprehend this phenomenon till after examination, and then Mendelssohn found a bond of union between himself and the indolent lazzaroni—a bond due entirely to the influence of climate and natural surroundings. Nature made everybody lazy at Naples, and the aristocracy were one with the lazzaroni on the point. "The atmosphere is suitable," wrote the composer, "for grandees who rise late, never require to go out on foot, never think (for this is heating), sleep away a couple of hours on a sofa in the afternoon, then eat ice, and drive to the theatre at night, where again they find no subject for thought, but simply pay and receive visits. On the other hand, the climate is equally suitable for a fellow in a shirt, with naked legs and arms, who also has no occasion to exert himself, taking his afternoon's siesta stretched on the ground, or on the quay, or on the stone pavement—the pedestrians step over him, or shove him aside if he lies right in the middle. He fetches his frutti di mare himself out of the sea, sleeps wherever he may chance to find himself at night; in short, he employs every moment in doing what he likes best, just as a brute does." It is said that the white man in America approximates more and more to the physical type of the Red Indian, and here Mendelssohn found himself becoming aboriginal: "I felt languid, disinclined for all that was serious; in fact, lazy. I lounged about the streets all day with a morose face, and would have preferred lying on the ground." And he was not pleased with himself in consequence. "I can perfectly conceive that it must be so, and why wolves howl, still it is not necessary to howl along with them." Perhaps he dreaded being reduced to the condition of Donizetti, who "finishes an opera in ten days; to be sure it may be hissed, but that does not matter, for it is paid for all the same, and he can then go about amusing himself." From such a fate, speedy departure out of the City of Indolence saved him, and soon the healthier atmosphere of Rome restored his wonted briskness.

On his way back to the Alps, Mendelssohn halted at Florence, and there wrote to his sisters a remarkable and pathetic letter which gives us a real insight into his nature. He spoke first of a visit to the picture gallery in the Palazzo degli Uffizi, and above all of a painting by Fra Bartolommeo. "The figures are about two-thirds of a finger-length in size, but finished in the most exquisite and consummate manner, with the most brilliant coloring, the brightest decorations, and in the most genial sunshine. You can see in the picture itself that the pious master has taken delight in painting it, and in finishing the most minute details." Here, surely, we have an outcome of Mendelssohn's own artistic sensitiveness. He who could never finish in a manner "exquisite and consummate" enough for his own exacting taste recognised a true brother in Fra Bartolommeo, and his whole soul went out in sympathy with qualities akin to his own. But the pathos to which reference has been made is found later, when Mendelssohn begins to speak of a portrait of Raphael by Raphael himself. We can all understand, without taking much thought, why the German musician should have been in especial sympathy with the Italian painter. They had many points in common—an attractive personality, brilliant genius, profound devotion to art, and a certain parallelism of fate. Mendelssohn, even in his first youth, must have been, so to speak, unconsciously aware of this; and we can understand with what emotion he stood before the canvas on which he whom kings delighted to honour has given his own conception of himself. "Raphael's portrait is nearly the most touching picture I have seen by him. In the centre of a large rich screen, entirely covered with portraits, hangs a small solitary picture, without any particular designation, but the eye is instantly arrested by it. This is Raphael—youthful, very pale and delicate, and with such outward aspirations, such longing and wistfulness in the mouth and eyes, that it is as if you could see into his very soul. That he cannot succeed in expressing all that he sees and feels, and is thus impelled to go forward, and that he must die an early death—all this is written on his mournful, suffering, yet fervid countenance; and when looking at his dark eyes, which glance at you out of the very depths of his soul, and at the pained and contracted mouth, you cannot resist a feeling of awe." One cannot resist a feeling, in view of this passage, that Mendelssohn read Raphael in the light of his own being; we all do this by others oftener than we know. Those "outward aspirations," that "longing and wistfulness," that inability to express "all that he sees and feels," that impulse to "go forward," and that foreboding of an early death, belong as much to Mendelssohn as to Raphael; and in describing the painter the musician depicted himself.

One other of the letters from Italy remains to be noticed, and it is valuable as having a direct reference to Mendelssohn's art, and his position with regard to it. A certain Frau von Pereira had written from Vienna asking our young master for music in illustration of a well-known poem "Napoleon's Midnight Review." Mendelssohn thought the matter over, but his artistic conscientiousness would not permit him to undertake the work. In the first place he had no sympathy with it. "I take music in a very serious light, and I consider it quite inadmissible to compose anything that I do not thoroughly feel. It is just as if I were to utter a falsehood, for notes have as distinct a meaning as words, perhaps even a more definite sense." In the next place descriptive poems are not good subjects for music: "Now it appears to me almost impossible to compose for a descriptive poem. The mass of compositions of this nature do not militate against this opinion, but rather prove its truth, for I am not acquainted with a single work of the kind that has been successful. You are placed between a dramatic conception or a mere narrative; the one in the 'Erl König' causes the willows to rustle, the child to shriek, and the horse to gallop. The other imagines a ballad-singer, calmly narrating the horrible tale as you would a ghost story, and this is the more accurate view of the two; but it does not suit me, the music stands in my way. My imagination has far more play when I read such a poem quietly to myself, and imagine the rest, than when it is depicted or related to me." Of course Mendelssohn could have written descriptive music to the verses à la Liszt's "Mazeppa," &c. "I might have introduced a very novel rolling of drums in the bass, and blasts of trumpets in the treble, and have brought in all sorts of hobgoblins. But I love my serious elements of sound too well to do anything of the sort, somewhat like the paintings in juvenile spelling-books, where the roofs are coloured bright red, to make the children aware they are intended for roofs." Here speaks the true artist, but, were Mendelssohn living now, what would he say? Would he tell us that illustrated spelling-books are our only study, and that we are all children in our love of vermilion roofs?

Next month we shall accompany Mendelssohn on his journey home from the Land of Sunshine, and mark how acquaintance with men and things had changed him for the better.

FREE AND CHEAP CONCERTS FOR THE PEOPLE.

By HENRY C. LUNN.

THE readers of our journal will remember how often and how earnestly we have urged upon those art-lovers who have the means at their command, the advisability of using some portion of their capital, so that during their lifetime they may have the pleasure of finding it return a satisfactory dividend of honour. That this may be done in various ways has been proved by the number of those who have, both privately and publicly, founded scholarships for the education of the musically gifted, who, but for such timely aid, might remain for ever unknown, and also by those who by their warm patronage have materially aided in the establishment of large choral bodies in many parts of England. But the Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. Alderman Jesse Collings, has initiated a project so truly benevolent in its object, and so powerful in its effect upon the art, as to call forth the gratitude of all who desire the spread of music amongst the masses. It is of course good to talk to the working-man of the humanising power of the art, to place within his reach the best works of the great masters, to accustom him to speak of the standard compositions in music as of the standard compositions in literature, yet how can he grow to the knowledge and love of these creations when the difficulties of hearing them are almost insurmountable? The Mayor of Birmingham, then, with the true feeling of a philanthropist and the energetic action of a practical man, has instituted a series of four Concerts at the Town Hall (the last of which was given on the 24th ult.), to which he invited working-men and their families, issuing tickets admitting them free of expense, and merely indicating his wish that when they could not be used they should be returned, so that no place in the Hall might be vacant. And now, to show what excellent taste has been displayed in carrying out this enterprise, let us put on record a few of the details. In the first place the tickets for the four Concerts, 12,000, were sent in batches of six, eight, and ten to the various manufacturers in the town, accompanied by a circular, from which we quote the following address: "It is to be regretted that in this town no opportunity exists for hearing high-class music except by payments which are so high that they place this privilege out of the reach of the majority of our townspeople; and it consequently happens that the popular taste for music remains undeveloped, and the pure delight and absolute usefulness of good music are both comparatively unknown and unenjoyed. I therefore propose to invite to these concerts those persons who from various reasons are unable to obtain the enjoyment of listening to high-class music, in the hope not only of affording an evening's pleasure to a large number of people, but also that from these concerts something permanent may grow, which may result in bringing good music within the reach of all classes." It must also be said that programmes of these concerts were distributed gratuitously at the doors; and that, as a record of the event, each visitor was allowed to retain his ticket, which was simply in the form of an elegant invitation card. Now, it has often been said that what are termed "concerts for the people" must necessarily contain a very large proportion of common-place and "sensational" compositions adapted to the taste of those who are incapable of appreciating good works. This principle we have always combated and shall continue to combat whenever opportunity offers; but far better than all theorising upon the subject is the practical proof given us by the Mayor of Birmingham that the very music that the "people" are, as a rule, debarred from is precisely that which they most want to hear. Acting upon this truth, then, the selections have included excerpts from the "Messiah," "Judas Maccabæus," the "Creation," "St. Paul," and other standard works, the choruses being given by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. W. C. Stockley, and the solo vocalists being in every instance thoroughly capable of rendering the music entrusted to them. In addition to these vocal pieces, several orchestral compositions have been contained in the programmes, the Overtures to "Oberon" and "Semiramide," the Allegretto from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," being amongst the works chosen. Speaking of the reception of the music by an audience, be it remembered, composed almost exclusively of working-men and their families, the Birmingham Daily Mail says, "the applause which greeted each item was a sufficient proof that the generosity of Alderman Jesse Collings was warmly appreciated." When to this we add that at the conclusion of the entertainment "three cheers were called for the Mayor, and loudly responded to," it will be seen that the audience wished not only to thank the munificent donor of these concerts for his gift, but to prove to him that they had found the gift fully worthy of their acceptance.

Much has been said and written in the present day about "Musical Education"; and it seems almost to have been brought as a charge against those whose life is spent in daily drudgery that when they hear music they care only for the inferior specimens. But is this not very like telling a poor working-man that he prefers beer to wine and foul air to pure air, simply because he drinks the beverage he can afford, and lives in some close and confined tenement the rent of which he can just contrive to pay out of his scanty wages? Some time ago we related our conversation with an artisan who was listening to the music outside the cathedral at one of the Three Choir Festivals. To him, evidently, being inside the cathedral was a thing not to be for a moment thought of. "The Festival's not for such as us," he said, as if he had thoroughly made up his mind to be content with the state of life in which he had been placed; but there could not be two opinions as to his desire to hear the great works; and if an Alderman Jesse Collings had resided in that town, he might not only have made this one man supremely happy, but—to our own knowledge—a very large number of his fellow-workmen. May it not be earnestly hoped, then, that the example set in Birmingham will be followed in many other towns? We hear much of idleness, of intemperance, and even crime in the large manufacturing districts; and it is of course good that stringent repressive measures should be enforced. But Mayors and Corporations have large powers to attract towards good, as well as to deter from evil; and music in its direct influence upon all classes of society is now universally admitted to be one of the most important agents in civilisation. Free concerts of high-class music would indeed be a boon to many who are now compelled to seek excitement either from the public-house or the low music-hall; and we are convinced that wherever they are instituted they will be fully valued.

Pending, however, the establishment of concerts without any charge for admission, it would be good to encourage the growth of those where merely a nominal sum is charged for tickets; and we are happy to say that we have now a prospectus before us which contains the welcome intelligence that in the metropolis a committee has been formed to carry out this project, and in various parts of London concerts on this plan have already taken place. Instead of hiring one of our principal concert-rooms, as at Birmingham, however, and inviting the people to come to the music, it appears to be thought better to take the music to the people, and concerts therefore have been given in Whitechapel and Chelsea to crowded audiences. The prospectus of this Association, which is termed the "People's Concert Society," announces that "a series of concerts will be arranged to take place every winter, to be repeated at different centres in London," and that "as a general rule, as much time will be devoted to instrumental music as to vocal. The prices of admission will in all cases be very low, varying probably from twopence to a shilling." Concerts have also been given on Sundays, no charge being made for admission; but voluntary contributions were invited from the audience, and we are informed that the invitation was liberally responded to. The programmes of these entertainments have been uniformly of a high character, the express object of the Society being, as is declared in the prospectus, "to increase the popularity of good music," and there is every hope that the appeal for funds to continue this praiseworthy work will meet with a ready response. Whatever may be the result, however, all honour is due to the promoters of this movement. The committee of the "People's Concert Society," by instituting cheap musical entertainments, has shown a sympathy with the intellectual wants of the poorer classes which cannot fail to meet with ready appreciation; and Alderman Jesse Collings in issuing free invitations to working-men to listen to the compositions of the great masters, has not only performed a noble action, but proved himself thoroughly worthy of holding the office of Mayor in a town which is celebrated throughout the world for its devotion to the encouragement and progress of high-class music.

LET the universe be informed—for otherwise it certainly will not find out—that "there is an analogy between the combat scene in 'Siegfried' (act ii.) and the grave-yard scene in 'Don Giovanni.'" Perhaps the reader is puzzled. But let him ponder on this revelation, and remember that great and original ideas are never understood at once. And let him note also this: "the analogy lies in the metaphysical signification of the scenes." As a preparatory study a repeated reading of Schopenhauer's "Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung" may be confidently recommended. Still, unless the student has "the capability of merging himself in nature, of identifying himself with every individual thing in nature, and of surrendering himself as an individual to, and of losing himself in, the great All," he must not expect to comprehend the full meaning of Siegfried's combat with the dragon (Wurm), and the latter's defeat and death. Herr Eduard Kulke, the discoverer of the analogy, relates a conversation which he had at Bayreuth with a gentleman who maintained that a singing dragon was nonsense pure and simple. Herr Kulke, however, pointed out to him that if that were true, a singing statue must be likewise nonsense. His opponent thereupon replied that the statue (in "Don Giovanni") was in reality the ghost of the Commandant. "Ah," exclaimed Herr Kulke, "I have you there, for is not the dragon in reality the giant Fafner?" Here the dialogue ended. Somehow controversialists who report dialogues always get the better of their antagonists. Well, the dialogue need not have ended here, at least not for want of ammunition. Might not a little psychology have effectually silenced the crowing of the last speaker. Suppose now he had been asked, Is it not easier for the imagination to associate human intelligence and its instrument, language, with the semblance of the human form than with an animal of the most brutish and monstrous type? A few quotations from Lessing's "Laocoon" (on the limits of painting and poetry) would also have done good service. This dragon is altogether a remarkable beast. It has moved men to tears—such is its symbolical import. Herr Kulke, with reference to it, talks of the "objectivation of the world-will" (see Schopenhauer), and Hans von Wolzogen writes that with the dragon a whole generation of living nature, a primitive age of the world-existence (eine Urzeit des Weltdaseins), seems to perish. The dragon, on hearing Siegfried, asks "What is there?" This question throws Herr Kulke and others into ecstacies. The "what" instead of "who" is pregnant with deepest meaning. "Not only is the dragon not anthropomorphised, but the tendency of the spirit of the scene is to represent man as a thing in nature, as a part of the whole in the great complexity of the All." In short, Wagner's dramas, if we may believe the comments of these gentlemen, are a poetico-musical illustration of Schopenhauer's philosophy. But Herr Kulke's claim to immortality rests more especially on the discovery of the weak point in the Trilogy, which had escaped, as he modestly remarks, the fanatical hatred of Wagner's enemies and the equally blind enthusiasm of his friends. The error, he thinks, lies in the untenable foundation on which the vast edifice of the "Nibelungen" poem is reared. And this untenable foundation is no other than the false supposition that the dominion of the world is bound up with the possession of the ring. Those who wish to follow Herr Kulke in his discussion of the mythological, metaphysical, and other profound questions to which the investigation of the weak point gives rise must turn to the pages of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (1879, April 18, No. 17, &c.). The results of his efforts, however, may be summed up thus. The Trilogy contains indeed many contradictions in its details, but it is nevertheless a grand and deeply impressive work of art. "For a work of art," our new Columbus (he alludes himself to the egg of the famous discoverer of a new world) explains, "is no machine which stands still if a screw does not fit, nor a scientific system that breaks down if the foundation is shaken." This must be very comforting to artists. They have already learned that art has nothing to do with morals, now they are further instructed that art has nothing to do with logic. But what is our object in expatiating on this for the most part undigested and indigestible stuff? Simply this, that the spreading, comprehension, and recognition of Wagner's works are more retarded by the master's admiring commentators than by his fiercest assailants, more also in some instances by the praise than by the blame of the enthusiasts who, like Herr Kulke, reserve to themselves the right of private judgment in some matters. Happily for Wagner and the world, the vigour of genius is able to withstand the withering effects of hot and cold blasts from whatever side they may blow.

THE advocates of temperance do not seem to be able to get on without music. Our readers may recollect that some time ago we had a batch of compositions in praise of "Gingerette," sent for review; and we have now before us some "Temperance Songs for Elder Children," written and composed by E. Cympson. How old the children for whom these effusions are designed are presumed to be is not stated, but we imagine that it must be before they have arrived at "years of discretion," for, not to dwell upon the unusual manner in which dominant sevenths are allowed to scamper about wherever they please, in the musical portion of the songs, the poetry is scarcely of a nature to train the mind upwards. We pass over the direction, in the cricketing song, to "throw the ball gallant and brave," because we know that it rhymes with "lave"; but are at once arrested by the four following lines, descriptive of a man addicted to imbibing strong drinks:—

> What makes his limbs look shaky and old?
> Champagne and soda, and punch, I'm told:
> What makes his coat look threadbare and poor?
> Rubbing too much at the public-house door:

not only because of the versification, but because of the extraordinary direction that the lines are "to be sung antiphonally." The temperate hilarity of the remark, "I always like a pleasant cup of tea," with its choral response, "So do we," may be accepted without comment—save that we do not see why the tea should be kept waiting until "the cat has washed her face"—but the song which follows seems to indicate that the author is a little wavering in his choice of beverages:—

> Come, let us sing the praises of
> A something very nice, now—
> A most delicious tasty thing,
> I'm sure you'll all agree!
> It is not sugar, tarts or buns,
> Nor something made with ice, now;
> It is not pudding, pie, nor sweets,
> Nor yet a cup of tea.

The suspense here is of course intense; but the poet soon relieves us:—

> 'Tis cocoa, cocoa, a steaming cup of cocoa;
> 'Twill warm your hands and cheer your hearts;
> I tell you what I think;
> Like cocoa, cocoa, we ought to make life's yoke, oh,
> As pleasant, bright, and good for all
> As this delicious drink.

Even the ingenious individuals who recently attempted to find a rhyme for "Cyprus" could not, we think, have hit upon anything better for "cocoa" than Mr. Cympson's "yoke, oh."

THERE can of course be no particular reason why any large Hall, especially built for letting, should be available only for one particular class of entertainment. Associations will no doubt cling around it in the course of years; but these associations, although entitled to every respect, need not rule the proprietors in their course of action. Yet experience has proved to us that the public draws a line, above, but not beneath, which licence is fully given: in proof of which it may be asserted that a theatre may be occasionally converted into a place of worship without provoking a word of dissent, whilst a place of worship could not be temporarily converted into a theatre without raising a storm of indignation and even a protest from the legal authorities. We have been led to make these remarks by reading an account of a "Glove fight," said to be for the "championship of the world," which recently took place at St. James's Hall. "We will pass over the surprise manifest," says a sporting newspaper, "when after every small suburban running ground and back slum meeting-place had been applied to fruitlessly for such encounters, it was discovered that by means of their patrons' interest, the promoters of this 'championship competition' had succeeded in obtaining no less important a site for their venture than the great St. James's Hall." This "surprise" in a sporting paper may, we think, be even more powerfully expressed in an art-journal, especially as we read that "when once the last sovereign had been taken at the doors, it was considered better to let a horde of howling and moneyless ruffians into the Hall than to leave them outside to annoy neighbours and passers-by, and give an inkling of the curious congregation assembled within." In the "toss for corners," we find, "Stewart got the one farthest from the organ." Then came the usual business, told in the usual phraseology. "Allen home again on the chest," "Stewart countered on jaw by Allen's right," "Stewart got one in on the face;" and all this whilst the spectators, dissatisfied with the exhibition, were hissing and yelling, the seconds wrangling with them, and every brutality connected with "the ring" enacted on a spot hitherto devoted to the rendering of the sublime works of the world's "tone-poets." We care not to inquire who was responsible for this; but sincerely express a hope that, although we may have many more performances to record at St. James's Hall, they may be of such a nature as an artist would feel a pride in chronicling.

Every vocalist will, we are certain, agree with us when we assert that accompanying is a branch of musical art requiring a refined touch, a quick eye, and a sympathy of feeling with the singer not always united with executive power, or even with an artistic perception of a composition. That this truth, however, is scarcely acknowledged by pianists can be shown by the fact that nearly all those who play think they can accompany; and the consequence is that the special practice necessary to excel in this important accomplishment is rarely included in musical training. How keenly alive are the most eminent vocal artists to this fact, and how ready they are to acknowledge merit in this department when brought before them, may be sufficiently proved by a circumstance which has recently come to our knowledge. At the late competition for the "Llewellyn Thomas" and "Evill" prizes, at the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Santley acted as one of the examiners; and at the conclusion of the proceedings he took occasion to pass a high eulogium upon the students who had accompanied the vocalists, expressing his extreme gratification that this art was cultivated in the Institution, and even avowing his conviction that the success of the candidates had been materially aided by the excellent manner in which they were accompanied. Such praise from so high an authority was of course much appreciated by the young pupils; but Mr. Santley did not let the matter rest here, for the next day he sent a communication to the Principal announcing his desire to give a prize of ten guineas for the best accompanist, leaving the arrangement of any conditions of the examination for this gift to be decided by the Committee of Management. It is gratifying to find that attention has been drawn to this subject, for we are firmly convinced that the effect of a vocal piece is much more influenced by the accompanist than is generally supposed. The prize thus kindly proffered will doubtless produce highly beneficial results amongst the students of the Academy; but we may also indulge a hope that the publicity given to Mr. Santley's opinion by this practical proof of its earnestness will not be without its good effect outside the walls of the Institution.

The plan of demanding a fee for a duty paid for at a fixed salary is in our opinion a very bad one. Indeed so strongly has this system been protested against within the last few years that in most places it is visibly on the decline. On railways for some time gratuities to the officials have not been allowed; and at hotels attendance is charged in the bill, a method also pursued even at a public restaurant. But in Opera-houses and theatres unfortunately the practice still lingers, although many spirited lessees have made a decided stand against it. Of course it is perfectly within the power of any visitor to these establishments to refuse to reward a boxkeeper for opening the box-door, especially when the seat has been booked and paid for in advance; but it is sometimes extremely difficult to withstand his appealing look, more particularly when—as we have often ourselves heard—he accompanies it with the assertion that what he receives is all that he gets for his nightly attendance at the theatre. It cannot, then, be too generally known that Mr. Mapleson has this season instituted a reform for which he deserves the warmest thanks from his subscribers and the public. Not a fee is allowed to be given to any attendant at Her Majesty's Theatre; and the lessee announces that as all the assistants in front of the house are paid by him, he trusts that the public will support him in the movement he has initiated. Lest it may be considered that this address really means nothing more than that persons need not give any fee unless they like, we may say, from our own experience, that as soon as the boxkeeper has shown you to your seat, he politely bows and retires; and, more than this, that on a recent occasion when a gratuity was offered for a printed cast of the Opera, it was decisively refused, with an intimation that the attendants were "not permitted to receive a fee." As Mr. Mapleson, then, has shown us that civility and attention can be ensured from those he employs without exacting a bribe from the public, there is every reason to believe that his example may be extensively followed.

At last the question of the Paris Opéra is settled, M. Jules Ferry having conferred the directorship upon M. Vaucorbeil, a gentleman who, besides being a journalist and government commissary in respect of subventioned theatres, is described as a "perfect musician." The result was doubtful up to the last moment, but the news of the appointment soon spread, and the street in which M. Vaucorbeil lives was quickly alive with vehicles. From particulars which have leaked out, it appears that the Minister has driven rather a hard bargain with the new director. Among other things M. Vaucorbeil is to supply twenty extra choristers, ten extra instrumentalists, and keep five tenors always on hand. As a matter of course the French papers are full of speculations regarding the management, and it is affirmed that Gluck, long neglected at the Opéra, will once more have his day, "Alceste" and "Armida" being the works named as likely to be produced. But in any case hopes are entertained that the great establishment which has just got rid of M. Halanzier will prove more active under his successor. It ought, says the Ménestrel, to produce at least two new works each year, seeing that four or five are brought out at Vienna. "We reckon," adds our contemporary, "upon M. Vaucorbeil to release French opera from its traditional torpor." Meanwhile M. Gounod's new lyric drama is spoken of as the Director's first venture.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

It is well that Mr. Mapleson has so strong an attraction as "Carmen" ready to his hand, for this Opera, with which the establishment opened on the 26th April, can always be put up with confidence when the ungenial weather which we have had during the past month compels him to defer the first appearance of some of his principal vocalists. After many disappointments Madame Gerster came out at a morning performance as the heroine in "Lucia di Lammermoor," and was most cordially received. Her voice has gained both in richness and power, and her singing and acting elicited the utmost enthusiasm. Madame Christine Nilsson made her first appearance this season on the 27th ult., as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust," and received the usual hearty welcome, and a good effect has been created by Mdlle. Vanzandt, who made her first appearance as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," and achieved a fair success. Mdlle. Ambre returned to the establishment as Violetta, in "La Traviata," and Madame Pappenheim made a highly satisfactory Donna Anna, in "Don Giovanni," and has repeated her performance of Fidelio. There is no announcement, at present, of any novelty.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Whatever may be thought by the public of the merits of the Marquis d'Ivry's Opera "Les Amants de Vérone," there can be little doubt that it is a favourite with the two vocalists who sustained the principal parts. We certainly cannot say that, as in the case of Wagner's great lyrical work, an Opera-house was built for the express purpose of producing it, but certainly one was taken in Paris for the avowed object of performing it for the first time; and M. Capoul, the lessee, in order that the work should be heard under every advantage, engaged Mdlle. Heilbron to play the character of Juliet with him, knowing that she had already sung the music with much success in private. He did not retain the theatre (the Salle Ventadour) long enough to achieve a lasting success for the Opera; but the general impression was favourable; and as we have in the work produced at the Royal Italian Opera on the 24th ult., the original Romeo and Juliet, if the effect created in Paris be not continued in London we cannot account for it by the fact that it was less ably represented. We are not of those who speak slightingly of a composer because he is an amateur; but then, on the other hand, we do not admit his right to use his patronage as an amateur to walk over the heads of those who have twenty times his merits. The Marquis d'Ivry is evidently an accomplished musician; and having studied how to write for the voices, and to instrument tolerably well for the orchestra, he drags us through five dreary acts, of the music in which we can only conscientiously say that we have heard worse. These truths, in the interest of art, should be spoken, for—having that facility which is too often mistaken for talent—with slight encouragement, he might compose most of the important plays of Shakespeare, it being evident that he is by no means deterred by the fact of composers with real creative talent having comparatively failed in musically colouring the immortal creations of our English poet. To the credit of an English audience, it must be said that through the long hours—and indeed partly into the short ones—during which the work lasted, not a sound of disapprobation was heard; but the applause whenever it came was evidently wrung from the hearers by a sense of duty rather than of satisfaction, and so many took silent revenge upon the composer by leaving the house during the fourth and fifth acts, that the lessee, and even the Marquis himself, if he were present, must have been convinced that we English people have a very decided method of expressing an opinion without uttering a sound. It would be unfair to say that there is no melody in the Opera; but the long weary recitatives, and the utter want of dramatic power in the impassioned scenes, prove that the composer is quite unsuited to illustrate such a subject; and although Mdlle. Heilbron exerted herself with praiseworthy zeal—and really did obtain some genuine applause in the potion scene—she must certainly have felt relieved when her task was ended. M. Capoul sang the music of Romeo as if he really liked it; and this alone is a real merit in an artist; but that he could not convey his enthusiasm to the audience we have already recorded. The Nurse was carefully played by Mdlle. Ghiotti; and the Lorenzo of Signor Vidal, the Capulet of Signor Cotogni, and the Tibaldo of Signor Silvestri, were thoroughly satisfactory. The Opera was well placed on the stage, and Signor Bevignani conducted most efficiently. The work simply failed from its innate weakness; and we who, even now, call back with horror the recollection of a certain Opera by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, sincerely hope that the lesson may not be lost; and, for a time at least, that we shall hear no more of the works of those amateurs who are too apt to estimate their talents by their pretensions. There has been no other novelty at this establishment during the past month. Mdlle. Turolla has increased the good opinion formed of her on her début, especially by her performance of Leonora in "Il Trovatore." Mdlle. Valleria was warmly received as Zerlina in "Fra Diavolo" (her first appearance at this theatre); and Madame Cepeda as Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," and Mdlle. Heilbron (after an absence of five years) as Violetta in "La Traviata," were cordially welcomed. The début of M. Gailhard as Mephistopheles in "Faust" created quite a sensation, which has been continued by his Caspar in "Der Freischütz," and Leporello in "Don Giovanni." He has a fine voice, which he uses like a trained artist; and his acting shows the result of careful and intelligent study. Madame Patti continues to draw large houses, her first appearance this season as Lucia exciting the usual amount of enthusiasm. Her singing is even finer than ever; and her real dramatic instinct enables her so thoroughly to identify herself with every part that she need not, at present, at least, fear any rival. As a general rule the house has been exceedingly well attended.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

AN interesting novelty at the Concert of the 3rd ult. was Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyll," a work which was performed on this occasion for the first time in England. This charming little composition was written by Wagner in the year 1871, at the time when he was completing the score of "Siegfried." The name of the piece, however, refers not to the hero of the great Tetralogy, but to Wagner's little son, Siegfried, who was born during the composition of the work. The Idyll was written as a surprise for Madame Wagner on her birthday; it is for quite a small orchestra, but it abounds with characteristic touches of instrumentation which reveal its author at once. The themes treated are mostly taken from the great duet between Siegfried and Brünnhilde in the third act of "Siegfried," the general character of the music being dreamy and romantic. In so large a concert-room as that of the Crystal Palace it made comparatively little effect, but none the less is Mr. Manns to be warmly thanked for bringing it to a hearing. A second novelty at this concert was Goetz's "Spring Overture," not one of his best compositions, and by no means worthy to rank with his Symphony in F, given at Sydenham during the season. The remaining items of the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in F, Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, well played by Madame Montigny-Rémaury, and vocal music by Mdlle. Friedländer, and Mr. Carleton, a baritone with a fine voice, who made his first appearance at the Palace on this occasion.

On the 10th ult. the great attraction of the concert was the playing of Señor Sarasate, who in Vieuxtemps's "Ballade et Polonaise" and Tschaïkowsky's "Sérénade Mélancolique," showed his great powers as a violinist to the utmost advantage. As an exponent of the modern romantic school of playing, Señor Sarasate has few rivals, and the works which he selected on this afternoon displayed his abilities at their best. The overture to "The Renegade" by the Baron Bodog d'Orczy, which opened the concert, is a clever, but somewhat extravagant imitation of the style of Wagner, brilliantly scored, and in parts effective, though it can hardly be considered as a whole thoroughly satisfactory. The vocalists were Miss Georgina Burns and Mr. Joseph Maas, neither of whom needs praise in these columns; and the concert concluded with a fine performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony."

With the concert just noticed the regular winter series at the Palace came to a conclusion. As usual, on the following Saturday (the 17th) Mr. Manns's Benefit Concert took place, and (also as usual) a programme of great and diversified interest was provided, the only fault to be found with which was that it was far too long. On a special occasion such as this, however, the extreme length may be the more readily excused when it is remembered that Mr. Manns was, we might almost say, inundated by offers of assistance from distinguished artists wishing to show their regard for him personally, and their appreciation of his services to the art which they profess. Among the most important items of the programme were Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, exquisitely played by the orchestra, and Weber's Concertstück, very finely performed by Herr Xaver Scharwenka, whose judgment, however, may be questioned in using Henselt's variations of Weber's text, as if the composer did not know how to write for the piano. Señor Sarasate's rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto was another special feature of the afternoon. Two important novelties were brought forward both belonging to the "Romantic School." These were the Ball Scene from Berlioz's "Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste" and Liszt's Symphonic Poem "The Battle of the Huns." The former is a charming little movement, exquisitely scored for the orchestra; the latter, fierce and wild in character, impresses one with an indistinct feeling of great power on the part of the composer, but requires more than one hearing to be properly appreciated. To complete our notice of this concert, we must add that Miss Anna Mehlig joined Herr Scharwenka in the arrangement by the latter for two pianos of the Scherzo from his concerto in B flat minor, and that vocal music was contributed by Mrs. Osgood, Fräulein Louise von Hennig, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. W. T. Carleton, and Herr Elmblad.

ORCHESTRAL FESTIVAL CONCERTS.

IF there be anything in the mere title given to an artistic undertaking, we do not think the one chosen for the above four concerts which took place on the 5th, 7th, 8th, and 12th ult., to have been a very happy one. The word "festival," in connection with music, suggests a levée en masse of the artistic world, and a locality like the Albert Hall, rather than the modest array of foreign artists and an orchestra of no unusual dimensions (however excellent both) which assembled at St. James's Hall on the occasions specified. Our Paris neighbours opened a series of what were called "Concerts Festival" some few months ago, but they were monster performances of a national representative character, held in the immense hall of the Hippodrome; and this fact, we think, should have furnished an additional argument against the adoption of a similar title for an undertaking so very different in its character and objects. We have done, however, finding fault with what is, after all, but a matter of minor significance, and inasmuch as the hearing of a series of model performances is at all times an occasion of festivity to the musical enthusiast, we may even be prepared to acquiesce in the denomination chosen. That at all events the orchestral performances proper would prove of standard excellence was indeed a foregone conclusion, from the fact that the body of performers consisted of more or less well-known resident professors, and that they were led by the hero of the famous "orchestra of virtuosi" of the Bayreuth "Festspiele," Herr Hans Richter, with whose eminent talent as a conductor London audiences had already become acquainted during the "Wagner Concerts" of two years ago. Such being the associations attaching to Herr Richter's name, it would have been well if the fragments selected from Herr Wagner's latest works, especially from the Nibelungen Tetralogy, of which so little is as yet known in this country, had been more numerous, but there may have been reasons of which we are not aware against an increase in the production of compositions presenting most intricate difficulties, which can only be satisfactorily surmounted after a number of careful rehearsals. As a matter of course, however, the name of the Bayreuth reformer occupied a conspicuous place throughout the programmes of these concerts, the following being the more important fragments from his opera-dramas which obtained a hearing: Introduction to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger;" Introduction and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde;" the "Ride of the Valkyries" and "Wotan's Parting," from "Die Walküre;" the "Rhine-daughter's Song" and "Siegfried's Death" from "Götterdämmerung;" Overture and "Monolog" from "Die Meistersinger." It will be seen from this enumeration that the extracts selected were all more or less representative of the most fascinating elements of Wagner's compositions, exhibiting as they do chiefly his marvellous power of instrumentation, the bold realism of his tone-pictures (as for instance in the ride of the Valkyries), the subtle power of individualising and yet combining into a grand whole a number of melodious fragments (as in the noble funeral dirge entitled "Siegfried's Tod"). The greater part of the compositions mentioned having, however, already been previously performed in this country, we are not now called upon to offer a more minute criticism of these works. To speak of their execution on this occasion under the direction of Herr Richter is to recall on our part the experience of unmitigated pleasure, the only blur in the otherwise absolutely perfect interpretations having been caused by the defective intonation, during the performances of the last concert, of the brass instruments, caused, no doubt, by a sudden change of temperature. The vocalists during the four concerts were Madame Schuch-Proska, Mdlles. Friedländer and Redeker, and Herr Henschel, the latter particularly proving himself throughout a most thoughtful interpreter of Wagner's declamatory compositions, and creating a special effect in the fine meditative air of Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger." Madame Schuch-Proska showed herself worthy of the great reputation she brought with her as prima donna of the Dresden Opera, and was much applauded on every occasion of her appearance. The lady took part in the rendering of a duet between Senta and the Dutchman from "Der fliegende Holländer" (associated with Herr Henschel), as also in the "Rhine-daughter's song," besides contributing arias by Mozart and Handel (the latter composer appearing strangely out of place in his immediate association in the programme with Berlioz and Wagner) and lyrical songs. Madame Schuch-Proska possesses a most carefully schooled soprano voice of a high range (she is a pupil of Madame Marchesi), her execution of florid passages being faultless and her portamento admirable, qualities which show to best advantage in vocal compositions such as Susanna's air from "Le Nozze di Figaro," which, indeed, we have never heard more perfectly sung.

One of the four concerts given (the third) was devoted to chamber-music, on which occasion, besides Brahms's Quintett in F minor, a Scherzo by Scharwenka (capitally played by the composer), and Chopin's Fantasia in F minor, a new string Quartett was produced from the pen of Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, the composer also of a Symphony recently performed for the first time at one of the Crystal Palace concerts. The Quartett is written throughout in a musicianlike manner, and will, we trust, soon obtain a second hearing, when its merits may be more fully judged. It was well received on the occasion we speak of, being interpreted by Herren Scharwenka, Franke, Holländer, and Van Biene. At the conclusion of the concert Herr Grünfeld astonished the audience by his clever improvisation on themes by Wagner.

Two busts, representing Beethoven and Wagner respectively, had been placed in front of the orchestra during the "Festival Concerts," and indeed, although some orchestral compositions by other composers had been included in the programmes, those by the two masters just named formed the chief feature of their attractiveness, and the only one to render these concerts special. That the placing into direct juxtaposition of the two composers in their works, for the purpose of comparison, is a perfectly legitimate device will, moreover, be freely acknowledged alike by those who hold that Wagner is merely carrying out what the composer of the "Ninth Symphony" has left undone, and by those who take the opposite view. The second part of each of the three orchestral concerts proper was devoted to the performance of one of Beethoven's Symphonies, those selected being Nos. 5 and 7, and the "Eroica." They were executed in a masterly manner.

One word more, in conclusion, as to Herr Richter's conducting. Whatever may be said in favour of invisible orchestras, we are of opinion that the audience assembled during the memorable Bayreuth performances have lost a considerable element of assistance in the appreciation of the music of the Tetralogy in not seeing Hans Richter conduct. His bâton speaks the intentions of the composer whose work he is interpreting with an eloquence which at once attracts, and fascinates to the end, both executive artists and audience alike. His individual reading—for the impress of his individuality upon his orchestra, as may be inferred, is most marked—has in it nothing eccentric or obtrusive, while his manner is entirely free from the ecstatic and ostentatious ways of some modern conductors. The result is invariably a performance harmonious in all its parts, a fact which, if examples are to be quoted, was especially noticeable in the three symphonies, the splendid rendering of which no one present will easily forget.

According to an announcement made, it is intended to revive these concerts next season at St. James's Hall, when Beethoven's eight symphonies will be performed in chronological order, while at a final concert the "Ninth Symphony" will be produced at the Albert Hall, Herr Richter being again the Conductor.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

MR. LESLIE now limits his season to three Concerts, and it would be impertinent on our part to call in question his judgment. Short seasons, there is reason to believe, are coming into fashion—the Bach Choir, for example, confines itself to two concerts—and, under certain conditions, they are the best, because affording time for the careful preparation without which excellence cannot be reached. We attempt too much in this country, alike on the operatic stage and on the concert platform; hurrying work after work into view imperfectly rehearsed, and thus keeping the standard of public taste and appreciation lower than it would be in a more healthy condition of things. If we did a little less and took more pains with it, advantage would be reaped all round. At the concert under notice Mr. Leslie produced an unwonted number of new part-songs, as well as some which, if not new, were then added to the repertory of the Choir. And with them were given some of the choicest flowers from the rich old garden planted by the veteran masters of English song. One never tires of hearing these—of listening to such themes as Wilbye's "Flora gave me fairest flowers," and Morley's "Now is the month of Maying." They come to us ever fresh, though they reach us through centuries of time. As regards the novelties it may truly be said that some of them were not unworthy of association with the older examples. There is merit in Tozer's "Flight of Summer," which those who are susceptible to the tender forms of expression in music cannot help but appreciate. So with Pinsuti's "When hands meet," which pleased greatly and obtained an encore. Mr. J. G. Callcott's setting of "The lark now leaves his watery nest," is worthy of a name prominent in the annals of English vocal music. Everything Mr. Callcott writes shows a true artistic purpose in union with no mean skill; but this part-song is a peculiarly happy exemplification of the fact. As such the audience recognised it, and the composer, who conducted, was recalled amid loud applause. The next novelty was of a different character; to wit, a setting of the Hundredth Psalm as a motett for eight voices, by Dr. W. Pole. Dr. Pole is better known, perhaps, in connection with the science of sound than with the art of music, but this would appear to be the result of his own choice rather than of necessity. At any rate, his motett is an effective, not less than an ingenious, composition. Its plan is somewhat novel, combining, as it does, the Prayer Book version of the Psalm with the accepted metrical rendering beginning, "All people that on earth do dwell." The choral of the latter supplies a canto fermo around which, so to speak, the free music to the former twines and groups itself, and the result is remarkably interesting. We trust that opportunity will be afforded of hearing the motett again and again, in order to make possible an estimate based upon adequate knowledge. The work was sung almost to perfection and much applauded. In the second part of the concert came the curious exercise by Thomas Tallis, generally known as his "Forty-part song," and actually a work for eight choirs of five parts each. Writing for musicians, we need not enlarge upon the nature of this piece. They very well know what devices are implied by writing in forty parts, and that the successful accomplishment of the task implies no such astounding powers as non-musicians may suppose. But the work is as interesting as any other ingenious, if not particularly useful, application of labour and patience. That it was also effective in performance we cannot say. The complicated machine seemed to have become rusty, and creaked a good deal when set in motion. Other special features in this part of the programme were a part-song by C. Holland, entitled, "The Triumph of Death," and Grattan Cooke's "Tic tic," both of which had not before been given by Mr. Leslie. The soloists contributed their full share to the pleasure of the audience. In Mendelssohn's exquisite "Hear my prayer," Miss Robertson sang with more than usual expression, while in Leslie's "Fan" duet she and her sister, Miss Fanny Robertson, obtained a demonstrative encore. Miss de Fonblanque's rendering of Pergolesi's "Tre giorni" was thoroughly artistic and deserving, while Mr. Maas in "Ah! si ben mio" and Herr Henschel in an unpublished song by Bach, "Vergiss mein nicht" won cordial approval. Mr. Leslie conducted and his two faithful lieutenants, Messrs. Callcott and Ward, were in the places they always so efficiently fill.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THE second and last Concert for the present season, on the 14th ult., was one reflecting the highest honour upon this Association, for it brought forward the neglected work of one who was not only an ardent admirer of Bach, but the first person who introduced his immortal "St. Matthew Passion Music" into this country. "The Woman of Samaria," the composition of the late Sterndale Bennett, was indeed fitly chosen, not only as a represen tative piece of its author, but as affording evidence that the "Bach Choir," although exclusive in its title, has no desire to limit its performances to the works of any particular nation or period. We have reason to know that it was a life-long wish of the composer of the "Woman of Samaria," to set this subject to music; but he often said that although many creative artists commenced their career with an Oratorio, it was his hope that the composition of such a work would mark the termination of his own. That this desire was almost fulfilled may be in the recollection of many of our readers; for at the Birmingham Festival of 1867, for which the work was expressly written, the failing health of the composer rendered it impossible for him to conduct it in person, and the duty was undertaken by his friend, Mr. W. G. Cusins. There can be no need here to criticise this composition, for with musicians it has already taken its true position in the world of art. The public, however, has hitherto had but slender opportunities of becoming acquainted with its merits, the beautiful unaccompanied Quartett, "God is a Spirit," which was sung at the composer's funeral, and the pathetic contralto Air, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," being indeed almost the only numbers generally known; but now that its claims have been so ably asserted by the performance of the composition by the Bach Choir, there can be little doubt that we shall frequently have to chronicle its representation both in the metropolis and in the provinces. The rendering of the choruses at the concert under notice was highly satisfactory, every feature being intelligibly indicated by the Conductor, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and ably responded to by the choir. We may mention as especially deserving of praise, the Chorus, "Therefore with joy ye shall draw water," and the final choral piece, the singing of which amply proved the care and judgment which had ruled the preparation of the work. The principal vocalists, Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Messrs. W. Shakespeare, Thorndike, and Kempton gave the solo parts with excellent effect, Madame Patey's singing of the Air, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," being warmly applauded, and the Quartett, "God is a Spirit," eliciting a demand for its repetition which could not be resisted. "The Woman of Samaria" was preceded by Bach's fine Double Chorus, "Now shall the grace," one of his Church Cantatas (numbered fifty in the Bach Society's Leipzig edition), and a noble specimen of his sacred choral writing. Every justice was done to this work by the Choir, the points being attacked throughout with commendable precision and effect. The second part of the programme commenced with the "Pastoral Symphony" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the beauties of which were fully revealed by the exceptionally fine orchestra. Brahms's Motett for five voices, "Es ist das Heil," which followed, is a remarkably fine example of the composer's clear and solid writing. Founded on the well-known old Choral of that name, which is commenced by the sopranos, with a florid accompaniment for the other voices, it is afterwards treated fugally, and with a severity which evidences how thoroughly the master has grounded himself in a school of writing absolutely essential to be acquired by those who would earn a name for this class of composition. Beethoven's "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt" ("A calm sea and prosperous voyage") had evidently been well studied, for we have rarely been so struck with this work as by its rendering on this occasion. The singing of the whole of the first movement was little short of perfection; and if the composition should attain the popularity it deserves, we cannot but believe that it will be mainly owing to its exceptionally fine rendering by the Bach Choir. The concluding work of this excellent concert was Max Bruch's "Banquet of the Phaœcians," from his "Odysseus," a dramatic scene which could not fail to impress the hearers with a highly favourable notion of the merits of the entire work. The "Song of the Rhapsodists" is extremely original, and the choruses of the Phaœcians evince a vigour and boldness of thought which make us long to hear the composition in its entire state. London, we know, is slow to acknowledge worth; but perhaps as the "Odysseus" has been given both at Liverpool and Manchester, in the course of a year or two it may find its way here. Meanwhile we have to thank the Bach Choir for letting us hear of what materials the work is composed. Every justice was done to the solo portions by Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. Thorndike, and the scene was received throughout with the warmest marks of approbation.

MISS HOLLAND'S AMATEUR CHOIR.

Again we have to speak of good work done for art by an amateur Association which exists for no reason of pecuniary profit. A Concert was given on the 15th ult., at the house of Sir J. R. Bailey, Bart., M.P., in St. James's Square, on behalf of the "House-Boy Brigade," the executants being the members of the Choir above named. So far, happily, nothing distinctive marked the occasion. Our amateur musicians are never wanting when their services are required for objects of benevolence, and the times are, just now, very many in which they come forward either to help institutions that benefit the poor, or else to entertain the poor themselves by means of free concerts. Nevertheless, the musical afternoon in St. James's Square had a very distinguishing feature indeed, to be found in the nature of the programme. Here were no frivolous airs, no selections meant to tickle the ears of those who cannot tell high art from low, but much good solid stuff, with, by way of relief, Mr. Anderton's comic Cantata "John Gilpin." Selections from Handel's "Triumph of Time and Truth" formed the principal portion of the programme. This work, albeit published in a cheap form, has not yet gained the notice it deserves. But due favour can only be a question of a little while, since the Allegory contains some of Handel's freshest and most graceful, as well as most solid music. Much of it was composed in the hey-day of youth, when the master was surrounded by Italian influences, and although its present form occupied Handel's latest energies, the young and vigorous spirit is still apparent. But it is not even for "Time and Truth" that we ask particular attention to the doings at this concert. Handel we know full well in all the manifestations of genius; but we have still much to learn respecting one who died but yesterday, and who, obscure till the evening of his short life, enjoys only post mortem honours. Nothing of recent happening in the musical world has been more satisfactory than our English acknowledgment of Hermann Goetz. A year ago his name was scarcely known amongst us, and even when he was first permitted to speak through his art it was at an obscure afternoon performance of the "Taming of the Shrew," by artists equally obscure. Since then what a change has come about! His one symphony has been heard with delight again and again, his chamber music has found its way into the most exclusive of classical repertories, his opera just named is being prepared for use at one of our first houses, and English versions of his larger vocal compositions, sacred and secular (alas, so few!), are in course of publication. All this, while honourable to the departed musician, is honourable to ourselves. It shows that our public can frankly recognise a good thing, and generously acknowledge its worth in the most practical of ways. So regarding the phenomenon, we have reason to be proud of the place Goetz has quickly gained. Coming back to Miss Holland's choir, let us note that to it belongs the credit of first performing in our country the dead master's Cantata "Nœnia." This work is evidently the "Symphonie avec chœurs" spoken of by M. Pougin in his supplement to Fétis's "Biographie Universelle," but M. Pougin, a worthy successor of Fétis, gives a wrong description. "Nœnia" is not a symphony with choruses, nor, on the other hand, is it a dramatic Cantata, with characters and action. It has not even "numbers," but consists of one long movement in many sections, embodying a close and logical "argument," most pathetic in the application we cannot but make of it to the composer himself. For what is the subject? Simply a wail for the death of Beauty, as the Greeks might have wailed when their worship of the Beautiful was at its height. All the surroundings of the theme are classical and pagan. So to speak, the Athenians have met in full Academy to discuss the text, "the Beautiful must perish." And, first, they break forth with the exclamation, "Can nothing move the breast of the Stygian Jove?" No, nothing; and one after another cites examples of conspicuous failure. Orpheus could not redeem Eurydice; Aphrodite could not save Adonis; nor could the "immortal mother" protect her godlike son at the Scœan gate of Troy. "See," exclaims the chorus, "how the divinities lament that the Beautiful must perish, the Perfect depart!" and then they reflect: "The mean and base pass to the grave unsung; but a death-song raised by those who love us is glorious." Herein lies the consolation, and beyond this the argument cannot go. Did Goetz, we wonder, approach this subject with a presentiment that he himself was doomed to be a conspicuous illustration. Who can tell? But this is clear—that he treated it with profoundest sympathy and most pathetic expression, catching moreover, as did Mendelssohn, something of the classical spirit that animates it.

We do not hesitate to say that here we have some of Goetz's finest music. There is real feeling in the half-despairing, half-wondering exordium, "The Beautiful must perish;" while in the extended chorus, "What vanquishes men and immortals," the keenly sensitive expression of Mendelssohn, as well as a reflection of his style, may be easily recognised. Good and pure music is this; strong enough for its subject, without obliging the composer to adopt sensational measures. Passing the few solo passages with a word for their severe simplicity, we next arrive at a chorus in the unusual key of F sharp major (the work opens in F sharp minor), having as its text a reference to the "immortal mother," "But forth she came from the sea, with all the daughters of Nereus." Charmingly graceful, like some Corinthian temple, are the opening passages of this movement, and effective is the change on the words, "and their wailing uprose where lay in death her noble son." Contrast could hardly be better managed; and neither mind nor ear asks anything more grateful than the alternation of the two themes, which succeed each other like cloud and sunshine over an April landscape. Next comes an episode (Allegro assai) in E flat minor. "See, thou, the gods are lamenting," more intense as to expression than the foregoing, though not differing greatly as to style. This is worked out at considerable length and with much force, but yields place eventually to another episode (un poco moderato) in F sharp major, "Yet a death-song upraised by lips of affection is glorious," having a continuation, "He that is mean and base passes unsung to the grave." Here Goetz shows how adequate were his resources to the demands upon them. The continuation is especially powerful, though obviously a reflection of Mendelssohn, with its antiphonal passages in unison against the tremolando of the orchestra. Finally the chorus returns to the happy theme of the "death song," and with it the whole work deliciously ends. It is notoriously rash to prophesy, but we are inclined to augur for this Cantata much English favour. Its sobriety and earnestness, its classic beauty and stateliness, and its wealth of profound expression, will surely meet with a response from a people able to appreciate such qualities. Anyhow, the test will soon be applied, for a cheap edition of "Nœnia," with an English version by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, will shortly be issued by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and placed within the reach of every Choral Society in the land. Meanwhile, let us once again acknowledge the credit due to Miss Holland's choir, especially for giving us an opportunity of calling attention to the work earlier than otherwise would have been possible.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

At the sixth of these Concerts for the present season, given in St. James's Hall on the 7th ult., a return was made to the original model; that is to say, the programme contained nothing, a few songs excepted, but orchestral works. Amateurs, we believe, are of one mind regarding the advantage of continuing in this path, now that it has been once regained, a simple and conclusive argument in its favour being the fact that in these days of fierce competition superiority in any one department of art can only be maintained by exclusive devotion. Madame Viard-Louis's Concerts have won their fame through the orchestra, and as orchestral concerts policy suggests they should continue. The sixth programme of the season presented a considerable variety of standard works, and not so much novelty as usual. This, perhaps, was well, because, though novelty is a good thing, our public are not much attracted by it, and the popular mind is more open to be influenced by that which it has in some measure learned, or been warned to admire. The programme seems, indeed, to have been drawn up as a bait for popularity. Thus it opened, with the overture to "Tannhäuser"—a work always as welcome to the unlearned as the learned, since those who cannot appreciate its art can feel the stimulus of its excitement. Besides which the overture is one of Mr. Weist Hill's chevaux de bataille—the one perhaps on which he most safely and quickly rides to victory. Beyond question, his splendid orchestra plays it with an effect nothing short of astonishing, thanks above all to a body of violins unequalled in power of tone and unity of feeling. As usual, the audience were delighted, and wanted to hear the long prelude all over again. But Mr. Hill wisely refused the indulgence. Next in order came a Dance Air with Variations for strings, the work of M. Salvayre, whose "Stabat Mater" was produced at the fifth concert. This is decidedly interesting not only as an example of the composer's skill in an ingenious branch of art, but also for its own sake. The Air is quaint and pretty, while the six Variations upon it are marked by very considerable taste and fancy. Nevertheless, the little work made no impression, coming, as it did, after Wagner's exciting music. It is a chamber piece, and for due effect should be heard at a chamber concert, with no more than one instrument to a part. Following this was a novelty; to wit, an "Entr'acte" for orchestra by the Earl of Dunmore. The noble composer has long been known in society as a devoted amateur and practitioner of music, but not, as far as we are aware, till the marriage of the Duke of Connaught did he come before the public. Some of our readers may have heard Lord Dunmore's Wedding March played at Her Majesty's Theatre during the season of Mr. Carl Rosa, and can recall its curious independence of accepted form along with its steady flow of not unpleasant tune. The "Entr'acte" is, in some respects, like unto it. Originally, we believe, it consisted of but one movement, and was styled, for reasons not particularly obvious in the music, a "Pastoral." Subsequently, Lord Dunmore added a scherzo of thirty-two bars, and an allegro with solo for violoncello, which begins in D major, and, the original key being G major, ends in B minor. We do not look upon the additions as improvements. They are loosely written and poor in effect. But the original "Pastoral" has some attractions. It wants form truly: on the other hand, it contains some pretty melodies scored with a certain amount of taste. The moral is that Lord Dunmore should pass through a course of study in arrangement and development of themes before again challenging public criticism. The composer conducted his own work, which, however, called forth no special marks of approval. At its close, Madame Viard-Louis repeated her performance of Hiller's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor, obtaining much applause, and the orchestra played Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major in its grandest style, the violins once more earning golden opinions. Whether the fact that the conductor is a violinist has any influence upon this part of his band we cannot tell, but certainly his violins are of surpassing merit, and, as may be supposed, Mendelssohn's graceful music exhibited them to full advantage. Let us add that the Symphony was well given throughout, and received with the highest marks of approval. Boccherini's now well-known Minuet followed; the concert ending with Weber's Overture to "Abu Hassan." The vocalists were Herr Henschel, who sang Mozart's "Mentre ti lascio;" Mr. Maas, who made a great success with Meyerbeer's "Bianca al par," and Mdlle. Laura Stelzer, who contributed a song by Lord Dunmore, "Liebes geständniss" with violin obbligato (Mr. Sainton).

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN'S CONCERT.

A large and appreciative audience assembled at the Concert of the above eminent pianist on the 20th ult., at St. James's Hall. The programme was, as usual, most interesting to the lovers of pure and legitimate playing, for the works chosen demanded none of the especial characteristics of the "higher development" school; and, moreover, a Sonata for pianoforte and violin by the concert-giver, which had never before been performed, was included in the selection. It is difficult, on a single hearing, to do any justice to a work so thoughtfully designed in every movement, and so artistically constructed as a whole; but we may record our general impression that it is one of the best Sonatas we have yet listened to from the pen of this accomplished writer. Unquestionably the more important passages are given to the violin; but those which are assigned to the pianoforte are replete with grace and beauty of form. The first movement has a well-marked subject, effectively developed; the "Andante affettuoso" is a stream of melody, principally for the violin; the "Scherzo" is full of animation, and the Finale containing some of the best writing in the work, displays both instruments to the utmost advantage. The applause at the conclusion of the Sonata, which was played to perfection by the composer and Madame Norman-Néruda, was most enthusiastic. Another feature in the programme was the exceptionally fine performance of Raff's "Giga con Variazioni" (from Op. 91), by Miss Zimmermann, who was twice recalled; and doubtless would have increased the delight of her listeners had she repeated the entire work. The other instrumental items of the programme were Schumann's Quartett (Op. 47) for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, and Sterndale Bennett's Chamber Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in both of which Miss Zimmermann sustained the pianoforte part, assisted by Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), Messrs. Straus (viola) and Daubert (violoncello). Vocal pieces by the concert-giver, Schumann, Schubert, Deacon, Henschel, and Dvòrak were sung with much success by Mdlles. Redeker and Friedländer, the effect of which was materially aided by the sympathetic accompaniment of Miss Zimmermann.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The fifth Concert, on April 30, contained not the slightest novelty; but Beethoven's Symphony in C minor and Sterndale Bennett's descriptive Overture, "Paradise and the Peri," were welcomed both by the subscribers and the public as old and well-tried friends. Schubert's light and pleasing Overture "in the Italian style" formed an agreeable contrast with the other instrumental pieces, and was much applauded. M. Sarasate's fine performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto of course demands the same eulogium we have ever bestowed upon it, but we cannot be always saying the same thing. A good word is due to Miss Lilian Bailey, who in a recitative and air by Handel displayed an agreeable and well-cultivated voice. The Concert on the 21st ult. was again made up of familiar materials; but the rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat by Madame Essipoff was a prominent feature of the evening. We cannot, however, pay a high compliment to the general performance of the band, for certainly neither in the accompaniment to the Pianoforte Concerto nor in the Overture to "Leonora" had we the precision or the delicacy we should expect from a Philharmonic orchestra. M. Sarasate's rendering of Max Bruch's Violin Concerto was warmly and deservedly applauded, and Mdlle. Redeker and Mr. Joseph Maas contributed vocal pieces with much success. Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted, as usual.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The third Concert of the New Philharmonic for the present season, given on the 24th ult., at St. James's Hall, had a special interest worth noting. The programme contained the ever-fresh violin Concerto of Beethoven, and an Aria from the "Nozze di Figaro" as worthy reminders of a classic period; but the rest of the musical menu was confined to the compositions of M. Saint-Saëns, Sir Julius Benedict, Nicolai, M. Sarasate, and Mr. G. A. Osborne. The selection was not altogether singular at the present day, but in a "Philharmonic" programme it was certainly a courageous demonstration against the toujours des perdrix; and what is more, it succeeded. A very crowded audience gave continuous and unmistakable signs of the pleasure afforded them. After two hours and a half of music, including a Symphony and two Concertos, the hall was still well filled at the last chord of Mr. Osborne's MS. overture to the "Forest Maiden," which concluded the lengthy programme. For the generality of the audience the main attraction was doubtless the violin-playing of M. Sarasate.

Such perfect intonation and crystalline tone as that artist displays on his instrument, with the delicacy of touch and the humour we rather miss in other violinists of the day, are irresistible. Still the concert as a whole may be considered as being a homage to the French composer M. Saint-Saëns, who personally conducted his Symphony in A minor, Op. 55, and played with a quiet precision and expression truly admirable, his pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 44 (No. 4). M. Saint-Saëns has arrived at that period of his life in which we must soon know all that he intends to do. He is no longer a rising composer. He is an acknowledged light already mapped in the musical firmament, and the only question to be solved is one of relative magnitude. The two compositions heard at the last Concert of the "New Philharmonic" are in their class assumed to be amongst his best works, if not the very best. His latest and most successful Opera, "Etienne Marcel," we have not heard; but judging from his last pianoforte Concerto, which from the style of its composition as well as instrumentation, ought to be called "Concerto dramatique," and comparing the Concerto with the Symphony we should say decidedly that if M. Saint-Saëns is to attain anything more than a respectable rank as a composer it will not be as a symphonist, but as a dramatic writer. Wagner may be quite right in saying that the instrumental symphony is about to disappear, and certainly the Concerto, as we used to know it, looks as if it would soon follow. We will not say of the pianoforte Concerto of M. Saint-Saëns, as it has been said of Brahms's last violin Concerto, that "it was exceedingly beautiful until the violin commenced," but we must admit it marvellously resembled an operatic selection for the orchestra with piano obbligato.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE fourth and last subscription Concert of the season was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 5th ult., when Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral Cantata, "The May Queen," formed the first part of the programme. That, in spite of recent German importations, this charmingly fresh and melodious work still retains its hold upon an audience was amply attested by the applause with which each number was received; indeed, it may truly be said that its popularity increases year by year, the English character of the subject, as well as the excessive beauty of the music, ensuring it a ready welcome, even with a "mixed" assembly of listeners. On this occasion the part of the May Queen was assigned to Miss Bateman, a young student of the Royal Academy of Music, who displayed a soprano voice of good quality, which has evidently been trained in the right direction. Whether, however, it was judicious to test her powers so soon before a public audience becomes a question, especially as she has a local reputation which secured for her an overwhelming reception. Time, however, will not only ripen her natural qualifications, but place her in her true position; and the kindest friends she has are those who, like ourselves, counsel her to devote herself earnestly to study, and to learn to estimate the well-meant adulation of a select circle at its true value. The other principal vocalists, Mrs. Bradshawe-McKay, Messrs. T. W. Hanson and R. Hilton, were highly efficient, Mr. Hilton being warmly applauded for his excellent rendering of the song, "'Tis jolly to hunt," and the popular Trio, "The hawthorn in the glade," eliciting marks of approbation which might have been construed into a demand for its repetition, had not the system of "encores" been very wisely abolished by this Society. The choruses were well sung throughout, due attention being paid to the varied gradations of tone. An exceptionally fine performance of Brahms's "Song of Destiny" opened the second part, the choir evidently entering heartily into the true spirit of the music. We doubt, indeed, whether so excellent a rendering of this work has been heard previously in this country, and we must warmly congratulate the zealous members of this choral body, as well as the indefatigable Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, on so triumphant a result of their exertions. The purely orchestral pieces—Beethoven's Overture to "Leonora" (No. 3), and Mr. Prout's "Minuet and Trio,"—displayed the powers of the band to the utmost advantage. The brief movement of the talented Conductor has so much originality, and is, moreover, so charmingly instrumented that we cannot but hope that it forms part of a Symphony which may be heard at some future time. Its reception was most enthusiastic, the artists, as well as the audience, greeting the composer with well-deserved applause. The concert concluded with a spirited rendering of the March and Chorus from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," which was rapturously received, very few of the audience availing themselves of the privilege of retiring during the interval occurring before the last piece. Mr. Prout conducted with his accustomed care and ability.

SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL FESTIVAL.

THE Committee of the Shakespeare Memorial Festival, in their wisdom, thought it well to incorporate a Concert in the scheme of proceedings, and it must always remain a matter of regret that the programme was not of a more representative kind; surely with Sir J. Benedict and Mr. Cowen as Conductors, some Shakesperian overture or other descriptive music might have found a fitting place and worthy orchestral treatment. The leading vocalists were admirably chosen; Mrs. Osgood, Madame Sterling, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Santley, being fully equal to all demands which might have been made on their well-known abilities. As it was, the selection of vocal music gave great satisfaction to a very crowded audience; additional variety being provided in the shape of pianoforte soli by Madame Goddard, and harp soli by Miss Mary Chatterton. We must not omit to mention that a selection of part-music was sung by the London Concert Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. F. Walker.

MILITARY SERVICE AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

THE second annual Festival Service in connection with the School for the Daughters of Officers of the Army was held in St. Paul's on April 29, and, judging from the enormous crowd of persons assembled, its popularity has increased rather than otherwise. The bands of the Royal Artillery, (under Mr. Smyth), the Scots Guards (under Mr. C. G. Clarke), the Coldstream Guards (under Mr. Fred. Godfrey), and the Royal Engineers (under Herr Sawerthall), were in attendance, and played Mendelssohn's "Andante Religieuse," from the First Symphony, and Lefèbure-Wely's "O Lord my God," with marvellous effect before the Service. The Preces, &c., and Psalms were sung by the full choir, with organ accompaniment, but the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were accompanied by the combined bands alone. The music for these Canticles, by Mr. George C. Martin, was the same as was used last year, and the performance of it was an excellent one. The Anthem was the latter part of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, a work excellently fitted for the occasion; and after the sermon, which was preached by Bishop Claughton, Chaplain-General to the Forces, the "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung with splendid spirit and effect. Much might be said in favour of the use of military bands in our churches; certain it is that their many resources have not until lately been made the most of; and, if we mistake not, the day is not far distant when they will be used with great frequency in large churches on festival occasions.

FESTIVAL SERVICE OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY CORPORATION.

THE 225th Anniversary Festival Service of the Sons of the Clergy was celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday, the 14th ult., when the musical arrangements were such as we have been accustomed to under Dr. Stainer's régime. The Service was preceded by Handel's Overture to "Solomon," which was played by an excellent band of well-known instrumentalists, numbering about sixty, under the leadership of Mr. Amor. The Psalms were sung by the Cathedral Choir as usual, the band joining in the Glorias. Mr. Martin, who presided at the organ during the Service, contributed the music for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and Dr. Stainer's Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," was sung as the anthem. If space permitted, we should like to speak at length of this work, but its popularity is perhaps the best proof of its merits. In a work so uniformly excellent, it is difficult to single out any special numbers. The Overture, however, will be recognised by all discerning musicians as a work of very high merit, not only from the beauty of its subjects, but also for the clever manipulation of them. Although there is no special solo assigned to the part of Jairus, yet attention should be called to the expressive character of the recitatives, and the solemn reflective symphony which occurs in connection with this part, and which also serves as the introduction to the overture. The tenor solo, "My hope is in the Everlasting," need only be heard to be fully appreciated. A special word of praise should be given to the instrumentation occurring at the words, "I sent you out with mourning and weeping." Dr. Stainer has risen above the level of most English latter-day composers, in the great chorus of the Cantata, "Awake, thou that sleepest," which forms a fitting climax to the narrative part of the composition; and he has been so thoroughly successful in this, the loftiest part of his work, that we cannot help thinking his powers are not limited, even to those successes he has already achieved in this stage of his career. The "Wailing" Chorus, with hautboy solo (exceedingly well played by Mr. Horton), and the duet "Love Divine! all love excelling," will perhaps be the most popular numbers. The work concludes with a fugal chorus of a highly jubilant character, and the dramatic interest is greatly intensified by Dr. Stainer's ingenious treatment of the words at the termination of this fine movement. The solos were very effectively sung by Masters Banermann and Whittle, and Messrs. Kenningham and Winn, of the Cathedral choir. The preacher was the Rev. E. Carr Glyn, M.A., Vicar of Kensington, and the prayers were intoned by the Succentor, the Rev. Dr. Simpson, the lessons being read by the Rev. W. Russell, Minor Canon of St. Paul's. The "Hallelujah" Chorus formed a fitting ending to this very successful Service. The attendance was not so great as on former occasions, owing probably to some new arrangements as to the tickets.

Behold the Sun in gold descending

THE LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THIS great gathering of Gregorian choirs took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 15th ult., and was fully as successful as on former occasions. A word of praise must be accorded to the committee of management for their excellent arrangements. Those who have experienced the difficulty of seating a choir of 1,200 singers will fully appreciate the manner in which the directions were carried out. The processional music, which forms a special characteristic of these Services, was as effective as ever. The Psalms, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis were sung with remarkable steadiness and precision, the trumpets, trombones and euphoniums helping much to heighten the effect of special verses. If an anthem must be sung, we think the one selected (Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake") was the best that could have been chosen. It was not performed, however, with any great refinement with regard to gradations of tone, but upon the whole it was an agreeable deviation from the stern severity of the earlier Gregorian school of music. After the offertory hymn, the Te Deum was effectively sung to music composed by Pietro Alfieri, founded on the Gregorian chant. The Rev. Thos. Helmore occupied his usual post of Conductor, while the intonations were sung by two gentlemen specially selected for that purpose. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., presided at the organ, and to his skill as accompanist a great part of the undoubted success of this Service is to be attributed. The preacher was the Rev. R. R. Bristowe, Vicar of S. Stephen's, Lewisham, and the Rev. Minor Canon Russell, whose distinct articulation could not but be noticed, intoned the prayers. The devout behaviour of the vast congregation must have been gratifying to those connected with the management of this great Service.

ON Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., an excellent Concert was given by the "People's Concert Society" in St. Mary's School-room, St. Mary's Street, Whitechapel, by kind permission of the Rev. J. F. Kitto. Most of the performers were amateurs; but valuable professional help was afforded them by Herr Otto Peiniger, as violinist, and Miss Mary Carmichael, as solo pianist. There was a large and highly appreciative audience. Amongst the most successful pieces in the selection may be mentioned the glees and part-songs, well sung by Messrs. Ratliff, D. Jones, J. Marshall, and Pownall; Handel's "O, ruddier than the cherry," capitally rendered by Mr. Julian Marshall; the Andante and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's D minor trio, the pianoforte part effectively played by Miss Julia Garth Marshall, and Rubinstein's "Morceau in B flat" for violoncello, by Mr. Muir Mackenzie. Herr Peiniger was encored in a Tarantella by Schubert, and Miss Wakefield's singing elicited the warmest marks of approbation. The People's Concert Society was started a year ago, under the management of a committee of ladies and gentlemen, many of whom are well known for their interest in music and in educational and philanthropic objects. The entertainments are addressed to, and within the means of, the working classes; and the appreciation of the music, instrumental as well as vocal, evinced by these audiences, is such as to warrant good hope that the Society will succeed in promoting its object, and that it may be able to extend its sphere of labour by increasing the number of its concert-centres, and ultimately by forming, or conducing to form, local singing classes, thus giving to the people, by degrees, a personal and practical interest in the concerts. We are informed that those who wish to further this praiseworthy undertaking, either by contributions to its funds or by offers of help, in vocal or instrumental performance at its concerts, may obtain full particulars on application to the secretary, Clement Templeton, Esq., 7, Mount Vernon, Hampstead, N.W.

A MURAL tablet, in memory of the late Dr. Wesley, was erected on the 7th ult. in Exeter Cathedral, where he officiated for a period of seven years as organist. The ashes of the deceased lie in the Old Cemetery, where just three years ago they were committed to the grave with every mark of respect on the part of the general public and of the members of the profession especially. Mr. Sims Reeves happened to be in Exeter in fulfilment of an engagement on the evening preceding the funeral, and though unable to be at the graveside, caused a beautiful floral wreath to be placed on the coffin as his tribute to the memory of the deceased. Some of the friends who gathered around the grave of Dr. Wesley deemed it due to his memory that an enduring record should be placed in the cathedral where he officiated so long, and a subscription was opened in which many of his admirers in various parts of the country sought the privilege of joining. The result is a memorial as beautiful and appropriate as it is unpretentious. It is a tablet of white marble on a black ground, in the early English style, the work of Mr. Burke, of 17, Newman Street, London, and bears the following inscription: "In memory of Samuel Sebastian Wesley, Doctor of Music, Oxford, for many years Organist and Succentor of this Cathedral, who was born August the 14th, 1810; died April the 19th, 1876, at Gloucester, and is buried in a vault in the Old Cemetery of this city. This monument has been placed here by friends as an expression of high esteem for his personal worth and admiration for his great musical genius."

A MEETING of the Birmingham Festival Committee was recently held, when the Orchestral Committee reported the arrangements for the forthcoming Festival. The new pieces to be performed are a Cantata, "The Lay of the Bell," by Max Bruch, and a secular Cantata by Saint-Saëns, the latter being expressly composed for the Festival, and the former being placed by the composer in the hands of the committee for its first public performance in this country. It was stated by Mr. Peyton that M. Gounod had been applied to, with the hope of getting him to contribute a new composition, but that he had declined to do so unless the sum of £4,000 was guaranteed to him. We can very readily imagine that the Committee felt it necessary to refuse these terms; but considering that there are many fine works of M. Gounod still comparatively unknown in this country—"De Profundis" and "Gallia," for example—it seems incomprehensible that the opportunity should be lost of including one or two, at least, in a Festival at which the fullest justice can be done to their merits. In proof, however, that the Committee at least partially agrees with us that the next best thing to procuring an entirely new composition for the Festival is to revive an accredited old one, we may state that since the meeting recorded above it has been decided to include Cherubini's Requiem Mass in C minor in the programme, an announcement which we are certain will be received with cordial and universal satisfaction.

WITH the sanction of the Dean and Chapter, a Musical Festival will be held at Chester on July 23 and 24, in aid of the Cathedral Restoration Fund. The following works will be performed at the special Services in the Cathedral: Wednesday, July 23, at 3 p.m., Coronation Anthem, "I was glad" (Attwood); Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, composed specially for this occasion (J. C. Bridge); "The Last Judgment" (Spohr); and a short selection from the "Mount of Olives" (Beethoven). Thursday, July 24, an Overture by Handel, Dr. Bridge's Evening Service in G, and the "Lobgesang." The principal vocalists will be Miss José Sherrington, Miss Jessie Jones, Madame Patey, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Signor Foli. There will be a full orchestra, and the chorus will be formed by the choirs of Chester, Westminster Abbey, York, Durham, Ripon, Manchester, Worcester, Hereford, Bangor, St. Asaph, Leeds Parish Church, and St. George's Chapel Royal. Dr. Rogers, of Bangor Cathedral, will preside at the organ; and Mr. Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., Mus. Bac., the cathedral Organist, will conduct. Under the management of the able and energetic Precentor, the Rev. C. H. Hylton Stewart, the arrangements are being well carried out; and as most of the leading county people have promised it their hearty support, the Festival will doubtless be a great success. There will be a Miscellaneous Concert at the Music Hall on the evening of the 23rd.

A CONCERT was given at the Alexandra Palace, on Saturday, the 24th ult., at which Miss José Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Sims Reeves appeared. The selection of music was a popular one, and the vocalists above named were received by the large audience with the usual enthusiasm. Mr. Sims Reeves's songs, "The last rose of summer," and "The Bay of Biscay," elicited the customary encore, to which, however, he did not respond. The programme included selections for orchestra and chorus. In the evening Balfe's Opera, "The Puritan's Daughter," was performed in the theatre for the first time in London for many years, the principals being Madame Blanche Cole, Miss Nina Cressy, Messrs. Snazelle, Aynsley Cook, Ludwig, &c. During the afternoon two performances were given on the great organ by Mr. A. Dorey. Mr. Sims Reeves is announced for a Concert on the 28th inst., and performances of "Elijah" and the "Creation" will take place during July and August, the performances of Operas in English continuing each Saturday evening, Rossini's "Cinderella" having been promised on the 31st ult. A grand Opera Concert by the artists of the Royal Italian Opera, to take place on the 14th inst., completes the principal musical events announced for the season.

AN excellent Concert was given on Monday the 5th ult. by the members of the South Norwood Orchestral Society. The instrumental works were the Overtures to "Idomeneo" (Mozart) and Kalliwoda in F, the Minuet, Trio, and Finale of Beethoven's Symphony in C, a March from the Military Nocturne of Spohr, and the Serenade and Allegro giojoso of Mendelssohn for piano and orchestra. Considering the short existence of this Society, the performances were remarkable for delicacy and precision. Special praise is due to Mrs. Harry Brett for her rendering of the "Serenade," in which she was admirably supported by the orchestra. Mrs. Brett also contributed solos. Miss Morris, a local amateur, sang with great refinement "Love the pilgrim" (Blumenthal) and, in conjunction with her sister, Miss Jessie Morris, two duets of Rubinstein. Mr. Gardner Leader, R.A.M., was highly effective in Handel's "Honour and arms," and other songs were well sung by Miss Bawtree and Mr. Josiah Bawtree. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan conducted.

THE scheme for the Bristol Festival, which is to take place on October 14, 15, 16, and 17, was provisionally arranged at a meeting of the sub-committee, at which Mr. Charles Hallé attended, on the 21st ult. It was said that the principal parts would be taken by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. In the evening Mr. Hallé rehearsed the following works, Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" (No. 9), Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis-Night," and Mozart's "Requiem." The members of the choir attended in large force, and gave Mr. Hallé an enthusiastic welcome, and at the close Mr. Hallé addressing them said that he was much pleased with the excellent progress they had made under the careful training of the chorus-master, Mr. D. W. Rootham, and urged them to continue their exertions. The Right Worshipful the Mayor also, on behalf of the Committee, congratulated the choir on their success, and thanked them for the manner in which they were steadily endeavouring to make the next Festival a success.

ON Ascension Day a special Service was held in the afternoon in Westminster Abbey in aid of the Bishop of London's Fund. At three o'clock the clergy and choir took their places within the altar-rails, filling the whole space. Outside the rails was a full orchestra, and also an organ erected for the purpose, and over which Dr. Stainer, Organist of St. Paul's, presided. Dr. J. F. Bridge, the Organist of the Abbey, was the Conductor. The Service commenced, as usual, with a special Psalm (the 24th), sung to a chant by Dr. Bridge, the orchestra joining in certain of the verses with good effect. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a setting by Dr. Bridge with full orchestral accompaniment. The anthem consisted of a series of selections from Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah." The Dean of Westminster preached an eloquent sermon on behalf of the fund, and a collection was made at the close of the Service. The whole of the musical arrangements, made and carried out by Dr. Bridge, were excellent.

THE final Concert of the present season of the Brixton Choral Society was given on Monday evening, the 12th ult., at the Angell Town Institution, when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was selected for performance. A small but efficient orchestra was provided, and Mr. John Harrison presided at the organ. The solo singers were Miss Catherine Penna and Miss Janet Soulby (sopranos), Miss Coyte Turner (contralto), Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Trevor Roper (tenors), and Mr. Cecil Tovey (bass). The choir was well balanced, and the choruses splendidly given, especially "Lead on" and "Tune your harps," this latter testing to the utmost the capabilities of both voice and training. "We never will bow down" was well sustained, the fugue and imitation passages with which it abounds being firmly taken up and well supported. To the energetic conductorship of Mr. W. Lemare no small share of the success of the Concert is due.

THE Tufnell Park Amateur Choral Society gave its second invitation Concert (fifth season) on the 6th ult., at St. George's Church Room, before a crowded and appreciative audience. The programme comprised the "Song of the Vikings" (E. Faning); Pinsuti's "Spring Song" (unaccompanied); a Fantasia on "Lohengrin," played by Mr. W. Henry Thomas; and Sir M. Costa's "Eli." The choruses in the latter work were rendered with much clearness and precision of attack, the fugal singing being especially good. The soloists were Madame Dietz, Misses F. Angel, Forsey, Evans, A. and F. Philps, Messrs. John Child, J. Howard, A. Smith, Grylls, F. and S. Partridge, J. Bridgewater and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Mr. W. Henry Thomas conducted with his usual ability, and Mr. Frank L. Thomas played the accompaniments most efficiently. The Melo-Piano (Messrs. Kirkman's) was used on the occasion.

THE following was the result of the Glee Competition which recently took place at Huddersfield, the examiner being Dr. Stainer: That the first prize for a cheerful Glee be presented to the composer of "Jack Horner" (motto, "Spera"), Mr. Theodore Distin, London; that no second prize be given for a cheerful Glee, but that an excellent Part-Song, entitled "The Awakening of Spring," should either receive a prize or be honourably mentioned; that the first prize for a serious Glee be presented to the composer of "Winter Days" (motto, "Semper Fidelis"), Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Worcester; that no second prize for a serious Glee be given, but that a simple Glee, entitled "The Traveller's Return" (motto, "Edina"), is worthy of honourable mention.

SIR MICHAEL COSTA, the adjudicator in the String Quartett Competition at Trinity College, London, has delivered his award to the Academical Board. The first prize of £10 is awarded to the Quartett bearing the motto "Fide et fortitudine," and the second prize of £5 has been given to the work inscribed "At spes non fracta." Both of these Quartetts prové to be the compositions of Mr. C. E. Stephens. Another Quartett marked "Che sara sara," by Mr. Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., B. Mus., Organist of Chester Cathedral, is distinguished as proxime accessit. Honourable mention has been given to compositions by Mr. John Alsop, of Newton Abbot; Mr. Henry Ouseley, Nottingham; Mr. Arthur Carnall, Mus. B., and Miss Alma Saunders. Thirteen Quartetts were sent in for the competition. A public performance of the prize works will shortly be given at the College.

ON Tuesday, the 6th ult., the North London Philharmonic Society gave its third Concert of the season at the Athenæum, Camden Road, N. The works selected were Gade's "Spring's Message," Macfarren's "May Day," and Dr. Hiles's "The Crusaders," Miss Jessie Royd and Mr. J. F. Probert being engaged for the solos. The choruses were sung with great taste and prècision, showing the result of careful training. Miss Jessie Royd was highly successful in her rendering of "The Queen's greeting" and "Agnes' Song," both having to be repeated. The Concert was given in aid of the funds of the Orphan Working School, Haverstock Hill; and it is much to be regretted that there was not a larger attendance. Mr. A. A. Yeatman and Mr. Boddington Smith presided respectively at the pianoforte and harmonium, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart conducted.

THE Concert given by Mr. F. H. Cowen, at the residence of the Earl of Dudley on the 12th ult., was in the highest degree interesting, a Quartett in C minor, the composition of Mr. Cowen, being performed for the first time, in addition to several of his well-known songs, excellently rendered by Mrs. Osgood, Madame Trebelli, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Mr. Santley. The Quartett is an exceedingly favourable specimen of the composer's style—especially the slow movement and Scherzo—and, played as it was with such artistic finish by Mr. Cowen (pianoforte), M. Musin (violin), Mr. Hann (viola), and M. Albert (violoncello), it created a marked effect. Songs were also contributed by Mdlle. Alwina Valleria and Mr. Joseph Maas; and a feature in the selection was the introduction of some recitations by Miss Cowen.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society's eighty-seventh monthly Concert, given at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 16th ult., was chiefly noticeable for the capital part-singing of the choir in Leslie's "Lullaby of life," Pearsall's "Who shall win my lady fair," Mendelssohn's "Shepherd's Song," Callcott's "Returning Spring," and Cellier's "Pensioner's Chorus" (encored). Miss Agnes Ross sang three songs with much success, Coenen's "Lovely Spring" being redemanded. The other vocalists were Mr. T. P. Frame and Mr. W. Lloyd. Mr. C. Spencer West contributed a flute solo, and, with Mr. J. H. Maunder, a duet for flute and pianoforte, both being very tastefully rendered. The concert was efficiently conducted by Mr. Henry Baker, the new Conductor of the Society.

MR. RIDLEY PRENTICE gave a Concert at St. George's Hall on the 7th ult., which was well attended and highly successful. Mr. Prentice proved himself an able pianist by his performance of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (No. 2, Op. 31), and several small pieces of his own composition. He also played, with Signor Pezze, a Sonata in A major, for pianoforte and violoncello, the composition of Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, which was warmly received, and joined Mr. Henry Holmes and Signor Pezze in Haydn's Trio in G major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The vocalists were Madame Patey and Mr. Shakespeare, who, amongst other compositions, gave some songs by the bénéficiaire with much effect.

ON Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., a most successful Concert was given at the Lecture Hall, St. John's Hill, New Wandsworth, in aid of the funds of the choir of St. Paul's Church. The choir of the church, ably assisted by several ladies and gentlemen, performed the various choral numbers of the programme in capital style, and the accompaniments were excellently rendered by a very efficient orchestra, the whole being under the conductorship of Mr. C. W. Hanson, the talented Organist of St. Paul's. Several vocal and instrumental solos were given with much effect. Mr. J. W. Wilson, jun., ably presided at the harmonium, and Miss Shapley and Mr. Flavell rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte with the accompaniments.

THE members of the East Dulwich Musical Society gave their last Concert this season in St. John's School-room, Northcross Road, Lordship Lane, on the 15th ult. The sacred part consisted of Bach's Cantata, "God's time is the best," and Schubert's Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd," arranged as a quartett: both were duly appreciated. The second part of the programme commenced with a selection from the Liebeslieder, Op. 52, which was efficiently sung; Macfarren's "May Day" was also a decided success. Mr. Lawrence, Mus. Bac., Organist of St. John's, conducted, and Mr. White accompanied with his usual ability.

A TESTIMONIAL was recently presented by a select party of the parishioners of St. Peter's, De Beauvoir Town, to Mr. James Vaughan, the late Organist, as a small token of regard on his retirement from office, after twenty-four years' service. The Vicar occupied the chair, and in a brief speech asked Mr. Vaughan to accept the small gift it had been the pleasure of his friends to subscribe to, they all deeply regretting the severance of a tie which had existed between them so long. Mr. Vaughan returned thanks, and regretted the state of his health compelled him to retire from a labour of love.

ON Thursday the 15th ult., the third annual Choral Festival Service of Nonconformist choirs was held in the City Temple, Holborn Viaduct. Fourteen choirs took part, or a total of nearly 400 voices; the music was directed by Mr. E. Minshall, who presided at the organ. Tours's Evening Service in F, and his Anthem, "Blessing, glory, wisdom," were the principal pieces sung. They were rendered with precision and spirit. There was a large congregation. Dr. Parker preached the sermon on "The Service of Song."

ON Wednesday evening, the 21st ult., the Psalmody Association of Park Church, Highbury, had its annual Social Meeting and Concert in the Lecture Hall, Highbury. The first part consisted of Weber's Mass in G, and the second part was miscellaneous. Mr. E. Davidson Palmer, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of the Church, conducted, and the solos, as well as the choruses, were executed by members of the Association. During the interval an Organ Recital was given in the church by Mr. Palmer and Mr. Drewett, Organist of Harecourt Chapel.

MR. W. H. GLADSTONE, M.P., on the 8th ult. read an interesting paper on "Music in the Church" to the students of Trinity College, London, of which College he is Vice-President. Illustrative music from Palestrina, Dyce, and Dr. Wesley was sung by choristers from St. Paul's and the Chapels Royal. Mr. Mellor, Q.C., moved, and Professor Lott seconded, a cordial vote of thanks to the lecturer; and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt spoke in warm approval of Mr. Gladstone's remarks.

DR. SPARROW SIMPSON, the Precentor of St. Paul's Cathedral, requests us to state (in answer to inquiries) that he has still a few copies remaining of his "Second Report on the Music in St. Paul's Cathedral," and that he will be happy to forward a copy to any Precentor or Organist who may apply for one till his store of copies is exhausted. Gentlemen not receiving copies will be so good as conclude that their applications have not been received in time. Stamps for postage need not be sent.

THE annual performance of the "Messiah" in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians took place in St. James's Hall on the 19th ult. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Butterworth, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. There was a fine orchestra led by Mr. Willy, the trumpet obbligato was played by Mr. T. Harper, Mr. E. J. Hopkins presided at the organ, and Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted.

A CONCERT was given on April 29 in connection with St. Bartholomew's Church, Islington, under the con-ductorship of Mr. C. M. Anderson (the late organist). A selection from the "Messiah" and some miscellaneous music formed the programme. The soloists were Miss Coyte Turner, Miss MacDougall, and Mr. Alfred Mori, the band being led by Mr. P. Brown.

"LE ROI DE LAHORE" is in active preparation at Covent Garden; and Paladilhe's "Suzanne" has been looked at. Signor Tagliafico (De Retz) writes to Le Ménestrel in perplexity that the libretto of the second work makes Cambridgeshire peasants sing of growing hops, and, in 1787, wait for news of a University boat-race, which was not established till years after. M. Massenet will himself superintend the final rehearsals of "Le Roi de Lahore."

THE following is an amended list of the vocalists engaged for the approaching Hereford Musical Festival: Madame Albani, Miss E. Thursby, Miss De Fonblanque, Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Enriquez, Messrs. Barton McGuckin, Cummings, Santley, and Thurley Beale.

MISS ANNIE SINCLAIR gave her first Concert at the Langham Hall on the 5th ult., assisted by the following artists: Miss Anna Williams, Madame Belval, Messrs. Montem Smith, J. H. Pearson, Faulkner Leigh, Winn, and Lawler. Pianoforte, Mr. Henry Parker.

IN addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, Wigmore Street, for superiority of pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition of last year, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

THE London Church Choir Association will hold a Service at Westminster Abbey on Saturday afternoon, the 7th inst., at four o'clock, in aid of the Alexandra Orphanage. The sermon will be preached by the Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster.

MR. H. H. STATHAM will play a selection of classical Organ Music at the Royal Albert Hall on six Sunday afternoons, commencing on the 1st inst., at four p.m. The programme will include some of Bach's Organ Compositions on Chorals hitherto little known in England.

MADAME ESSIPOFF has given two Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall during the past month which have proved highly attractive. The programmes contained selections from the works of the best composers, all calculated to show the skill and power of the clever pianist.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT, M.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, the recently appointed Professor of Acoustics at the Royal Academy of Music, delivered a highly interesting inaugural lecture to the students at the Institution on Saturday afternoon the 3rd ult.

WE have much pleasure in calling attention to the forthcoming Examinations in Music at the Society of Arts. As they are exclusively practical—taking account only of voice, style, ear, and reading—they will doubtless meet a want much felt.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY has nearly completed her dramatic Cantata "Thalassa, the Sea Maiden," and those who have been privileged to hear portions of the music speak of it highly.

ROSSINI'S "Stabat Mater" will be sung as the anthem at the evening service at St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, on Trinity Sunday. There will be a full orchestra and a choir of 100 voices, under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

AMATEURS everywhere will be glad to hear that Madame Viard-Louis has secured an orchestral symphony by Georges Bizet, and that it will be produced at the end of this season or the beginning of the next.

AMONG forthcoming works by native composers is an Operetta on the subject of "Herne the Hunter" by Mr. John Old, of Reading.

WE regret to learn that the negotiations between Mr. Carl Rosa and Messrs. Sullivan and Gilbert for a new Opera have not reached a favourable conclusion.

MR. CARL ROSA, we understand, has determined to produce Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" during his next season at Her Majesty's Theatre.

IT is probable that a new sacred Cantata by Signor Randegger will be one of the chief features at Mr. Kuhe's next Brighton Festival.

MR. STEDMAN has been appointed Director of the Music at the Church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, Fenchurch Street.

DR. STAINER'S Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," will be given with full orchestral accompaniment at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, at an evening service on July 2.

REVIEWS.

Dietrich Buxtehude's Sämmtliche Orgel-Compositionen. Herausgegeben von Philipp Spitta. 12 Hefte. (Dietrich Buxtehude's Complete Organ Compositions. Edited by Philipp Spitta. 12 Books or 2 vols.) [Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT is perhaps hardly too much to assert that, excepting to musical archæologists, the works of composers for the organ anterior to the time of Bach are virtually unknown. There is a general impression that the great Johann Sebastian was the first musician whose organ music has any intrinsic worth. No one will question for a moment the dictum that Bach is the greatest of all writers for the king of instruments; yet it would be unjust to ignore the influence exercised upon his genius by his many illustrious predecessors. Organists such as Reinken, Bohm, Pachelbel, and Buxtehude, though they are to us now names only, wrote much without which Bach's organ works, such as we know them, would probably never have existed.

It is to Herr Spitta, the careful and laborious biographer of Bach, that the musical world is indebted for an account of the works and labours of these old worthies. The first volume of Herr Spitta's work contains copious analyses of many organ pieces written in the seventeenth century; and the author has now afforded organists an opportunity of making acquaintance for themselves with the complete organ music of one who, as is evident from an examination of his works, was a composer of very remarkable attainments.

Dietrich Buxtehude was a native of Denmark, being born at Elsinore, where his father was organist, in the year 1637. Concerning his early life and education nothing is known; but in 1668 he was appointed organist to the Marienkirche at Lübeck, where he remained until his death, in 1707. In 1705 Sebastian Bach travelled on foot from Arnstadt to Lübeck to make Buxtehude's acquaintance, and to learn what he could from hearing one who was reputed to be the greatest organist of his age. That he gained many ideas will at once be evident to those who study the present collection.

Of the twelve books before us, the first six (forming volume 1) contain twenty-four pieces for the organ, including one Passacaglia, two Chaconnes, thirteen Preludes and Fugues, three Fugues without preludes, three Toccatas and two Canzonettas. The second volume (Parts 7 to 12) gives us the whole of the arrangements of chorals. But few of these pieces have been previously published; Herr Spitta has found them mostly in two collections of manuscripts, one made by J. G. Walther, and the other by Sebastian Bach, whose industry in copying for himself the best works of his predecessors and contemporaries is well known.

On a superficial examination of the organ music of Buxtehude, one will probably be struck with its apparent general resemblance to that of Bach, while a closer acquaintance will reveal important points of difference in the workmanship of the two composers. Take for instance the preludes and fugues, which form the most important part of the first volume. Buxtehude's treatment of the prelude is much like Bach's; he mostly gives a subject with imitations and canonical passages more or less strict, interrupted by rapid bravura passages with frequent florid pedal solos. Many of his preludes might readily be mistaken for Bach's. Spitta (to whose analysis of Buxtehude's music we are indebted for many of our remarks) credits the composer with having been probably the first to invent rapid passages for the pedals; how Bach imitated them is well known to all our organ-playing readers. In the fugues we find a peculiarity of treatment which constitutes one of the specialties of Buxtehude's style. It is but seldom that the subject of the fugue is preserved unchanged throughout the piece. Sometimes after the first development a florid episode is introduced leading to a change of time, in which an entirely altered form of the subject appears—occasionally so far changed as to be with difficulty recognisable as the same. For instance in the Prelude and Fugue in G minor (No. 7), the subject of the fugue at first is heard thus:—

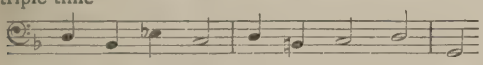
After being finely developed and worked for forty-eight bars, a short interlude introduces it in the dominant, and varied as follows:—

Fifteen bars later we find a third form of the subject—now in triple time—



In these examples the identity of the fugue subject is readily perceptible, but in other cases the alteration made is far greater. For example, it requires close examination to recognise the three following passages (taken from the great Prelude and Fugue in E minor, No. 6) as being variations, or rather perhaps metamorphoses, of one theme:—

At first sight these subjects appear quite different; the point of connection is to be found in the descent from dominant to tonic, by a spring in (2) and through the intermediate degrees of the scale in (1) and (3); while the rise from E to A, between the first and second bars of (3), is to be found in (1) between the first note of the fourth crotchet and the first of the following bar; and the skip of the fourth in (2) from C to G♯ is an irregular imitation of the skip from D to A in (1), the intermediate E (the last semiquaver of the first bar) being regarded merely as an ornamental note, and not an essential of the harmony.

This characteristic peculiarity of Buxtehude's method of composition is to be found in a large proportion of the works before us. We meet with it in a slightly varied form in the Passacaglia and the two Chaconnes with which the collection opens. Organists will be aware that both these forms of composition are constructed upon what is known to musicians as a "ground bass," the technical difference between the two being that in the Passacaglia the theme commences on the third, and in the Chaconne on the first beat of the bar. In Bach's well-known "Passacaglia" for the organ in C minor (published in the first volume of Griepenkerl's edition of the organ works), the theme remains unchanged, both in form and in key, till we reach the finale, in which the subject is treated fugally. In Buxtehude's Passacaglia, on the other hand, the theme, which is only four bars in length, first appears seven times consecutively in the key of D minor, then seven times in F major, next seven times in A minor, and, lastly, seven times in D minor; the varieties of the harmony and figuration being worthy of Bach himself. In the two Chaconnes, the key in which the subject is introduced remains unchanged; but the theme itself is varied on its successive appearances.

The second volume of Buxtehude's organ works, containing in all forty-two arrangements of chorals, is quite as interesting as the first. The volume is divided into two sections, the first of which gives the larger fantasias, &c., and the second the shorter and less elaborate transcriptions. Some of the pieces in the first section are probably among the longest ever written for the organ. We find a setting of "Nun freut euch, lieben Christen g'mein" (No. 5), occupying twelve closely printed folio pages, and another of the "Te Deum laudamus" (No. 7), which fills thirteen. In these chorale arrangements, perhaps, even more than in the works contained in the first volume, we see the influence of the old master upon Bach. This may be noticed in the method of alternating and combining two manuals (the "Rückpositiv" and "Oberwerk"), as in Nos. 1, 5, and 7 of the first section, and in the majority of those of the second section, in which, though with one exception (No. 14), two manuals are not indicated, it is frequently impossible to perform the music otherwise. In the fugal treatment of the various lines of the chorals, we are frequently reminded of Bach, while at the end of "Lobt Gott, ihr Christen allzugleich" (No. 20 of the second section) we see a foreshadowing of Bach's effects of the double pedal part. Probably the most curious piece in the entire collection is the last—the arrangement of "Auf meinen lieben Gott." This is in the form of a suite. We have first the choral, then a "double" or variation upon it, and after this a sarabande, courante and gigue, all founded upon the theme of the choral. The piece can surely hardly have been intended for church use!

We close this notice with a warm recommendation of the collection to all organists who prefer the legitimate style of playing to the modern school, as seen in much of the organ music, especially French organ music, published at the present day. All who admire Bach will be interested to know something of one of the greatest of his predecessors.

The Story of Mozart's Requiem. By William Pole, F.R.S., Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

DR. POLE truly says, "The general impressions about the history of the Requiem are not in accordance with the facts, many of which have indeed only been brought to light at a comparatively recent date." As these "impressions," however, not only often pass current in musical circles, but constantly appear in print, and are therefore extremely likely to mislead many who wish for accurate information on the subject, the author of the essay before us (which has already appeared from month to month in THE MUSICAL TIMES), has earned the warm thanks of all musicians for so excellently collating all the materials at command, and weaving them together into a story which so completely engrosses the attention of the reader, that it may be conscientiously recommended even to those who might peruse it without a thought of its value to art-history. That Mozart did not live to finish the Requiem is well known; but after his death the difficulty of proving how much was really composed by him became almost insurmountable, partly because his widow, in her intense desire to make as much money as she could out of the composition, was not over-scrupulous as to the manner in which she obtained what she termed "authentic copies"; and partly because the attached friend and pupil of the composer, Süssmayer, boldly laid claim to the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei as entirely his own composition, asserting also that he had written the latter part of the Dies Iræ, and instrumented a large portion of the work from the figured bass of Mozart. The interest taken by Gottfried Weber in the controversy as to the authenticity of various parts of the Requiem is well known. His deliberately expressed conviction that Süssmayer had not claimed too much—but too little—share in its composition, of course called forth communications from all the leading musicians of the time; but no doubt the most important person who took part in the dispute was the Abbé Maximilian Stadler, who had known Mozart from his infancy, and who not only bore testimony to the fact of Süssmayer's not having touched the original manuscript, but revealed, in a private letter to Weber, that the name of the mysterious individual who had commissioned Mozart to write the work was a certain Count Walsegg. It has always appeared to us—and Dr. Pole seems to agree with our supposition—that in the main Süssmayer's statements were corroborated by after-events; although it is possible that his memory may have failed him in relating some minute particulars respecting his work. "The legal investigation which took place on Count Walsegg's behalf," it is said, "shortly after the publication of Süssmayer's letter, must certainly have led to the exposure of his imposture, had it been such; but so far from this we are told that in this investigation the respective parts of the two composers, very nearly as described by Süssmayer himself, were distinctly pointed out to the Count's advocate." It is impossible to imagine a more attractive little book to Mozart-lovers than this history of the most important work of the great master. "It is necessary," says the author, "in order to render intelligible the proceedings during the greater part of the time, to keep back some of the earliest incidents, the knowledge of which did not transpire till the end. It is, in this respect, like a novel, the interest of which hangs on a mystery only revealed in the last chapter." This plan constitutes the great charm of the work, for the thread of the narrative is so skilfully preserved throughout that the reader cannot lay down the book when once fairly carried on by the events which seem constantly arising to lure him forward. We hope, and indeed confidently predict, that the author's labours in so good a cause will be rewarded by an extensive sale of his interesting "story."

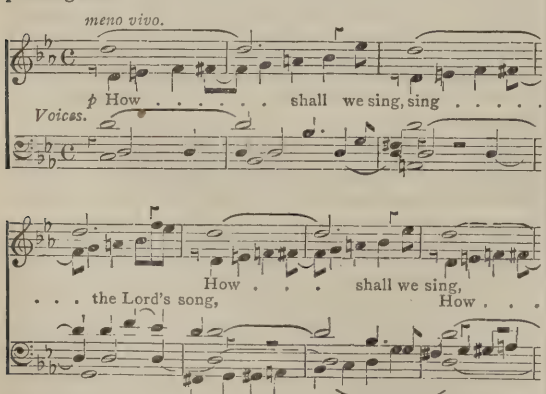
Novello's Octavo Anthems. "By the Rivers of Babylon." "For the Mountains shall depart." Composed by L. Samson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN the first of these anthems we have another musical illustration of a text which, by reason of its pathos and beauty, will never cease to attract composers. In times to come, as in times past, the pitiful lament of the captive Israelites whose harps hung silent upon the willows, cannot fail to kindle the imagination and arouse the sympathy of musicians. None may hope to have a monopoly of it, and whether he be the Englishman Boyce, the Frenchman Gounod, the German Goetz, or the composer whose work is now before us, each must rest content with the position of one among many capable exponents of a subject that, in Wagnerian phrase, "yearns" after expression and is never satisfied. There are many good points in Mr. Samson's handling of the subject, not so much in the opening passages, perhaps, as farther on, and especially in the treatment of the words, "How shall we sing the Lord's song." This is decidedly and conspicuously happy. The voice part is simple enough—contraltos and basses answering sopranos and tenors with short unisonous phrases—and we must look to the accompaniment for an expression of the agitation and intensity of feeling conveyed by the words. This we find in the subjoined passage and its prolongation:—



Here, as it seems to us, the case is fully met. Again, after a vigorous unison passage on the words, "If I prefer not Jerusalem," occurs a crescendo thoughtfully expressive of the swelling emotions called up by the name of the beloved city:—

This is followed by a reprise of the leading subject, now treated in a varied and much improved form. Altogether, the anthem is one of considerable musical interest, and distinguished by a novelty of style that cannot fail to arrest attention wherever it is heard.

The second anthem is less striking, because more conventional. It may, however, please a larger public than its companion on that very account, especially as it cannot be accused of poverty of idea or treatment. Every phrase is dealt with in a musicianly fashion, and the sentiment of the text well expressed. Moreover, the anthem presents no difficulty, and could easily be mastered by a village choir having a single boy capable of singing a few solo bars.

Suites de Pièces, for the Pianoforte. No. 1, Contentment; No. 2, Energy; No. 3, Mirth; No. 4, Joy. Composed by C. J. Ridsdale. [Enoch and Sons.]

IN the present day the line which separates either vocal or instrumental amateurs from professors is often by no means to be determined by the amount of talent or the amount of training they exhibit before the public. Choral bodies, solo singers, and even exponents of high-class musical compositions, are now to be found fully capable of taking their place in the world of art; and when we speak of an executant, therefore, as an "amateur," we simply mean that he or she does not live by the profession. Whether amateur composers may eventually take equal rank with the established creative artists of the day still remains to be proved. Certainly there can be no reason why they should not possess as much natural talent, or study as deeply as the professor; but as they usually move amongst, and are judged by, a limited coterie of admirers, they have rarely the power of accurately measuring their true capabilities. In playing through the "Suite de Pièces" of Mr. Ridsdale, however, the first thing that strikes us is that it is written not for the drawing-room but for the study; and herein we are assured of the fact that, whether amateur or professor, the composer is an artist; every movement indeed is remarkable for vigour of style and knowledge of contrapuntal effect; and although the writing seems almost to prove that the author is essentially an organist, the passages, when well studied, are perfectly playable on the pianoforte. The first piece, "Contentment," has a well-marked subject (reminding us, however, of that in the first movement of Mozart's Sonata in F, No. 15, in Agnes Zimmermann's edition), the treatment of which is skilful and musicianlike throughout. As we have said, the parts can well be reached, but where they are widely separated it would certainly be advisable to indicate with which hand the notes are to be taken. We may also mention that in bar 24, page 3, there is something omitted between the upper F and E. No. 2, "Energy," is a spirited movement, which will well repay practice. No. 3, "Mirth," in Minuet form, has all the life and vivacity demanded by its title, and No. 4, "Joy," may be cited as, musically speaking, the best number of the set, the various passages of imitation and the general design of the movement evidencing that definite plan which is the surest indication of a composer's power. "Suite de Pièces" is a title which would perhaps lead us to anticipate a less modern series of movements; but however they may be named, they would challenge comparison with most recent compositions of this class; and if, as we presume, the work of an amateur, deserve additional praise as real contributions to art.

Carmen. Opera in Four Acts. The English version by Henry Hersee. The music composed by Georges Bizet. [Metzler and Co.]

THIS opera is now so firmly established in public favour, and we have already given so full a review of its merits, that it remains only to notice the English words, supplied by Mr. Henry Hersee. In criticising the result of the translator's task, there can be no question that the fairest method is first to test the effect of the text in performance. This we have done; and can affirm that not only in the songs, but throughout the concerted music, the words are most aptly fitted to the notes. Those who read the English version, too, apart from its stage representation, will find that it reflects the spirit of the original very fairly; and we congratulate the publishers upon having provided us with so excellent an addition to our "Operas in English," the words of which are too often unworthy of the music.

Menuetto from Haydn's Quartett in D minor; for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Agnes Zimmermann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT is well when so accomplished an artist as Miss Zimmermann undertakes the transcription of classical works; for we know that, although the passages will be well adapted to the pianoforte, they will not be tortured from their original form to please those amateurs who, instead of desiring to raise themselves to the music, prefer that the music shall be lowered to their capacities. The arrangement of the Menuetto before us will of course more interest those who are acquainted with the Quartett from which it is taken; but as a pianoforte piece it is extremely effective, and students cannot have this class of music too often placed before them.

Danse Norvégienne pour le Pianoforte. Par Louis Samson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE intelligent art-loving public will always have a welcome for national music, even in its lightest forms, not only for its own sake as music, but for the materials and suggestions it offers to composers. All the great masters, we need not say, have drawn with good effect upon this exhaustless store, while those of our own day are fully alive to its value. As yet, however, comparatively small use has been made of the national music of Scan inavia, both Norwegian and Swedish musicians aspiring rather to be Germans of the Germans than exponents of their own native art. None the less, however, is Scandinavian national music charming in its distinctiveness, as all must allow who make acquaintance with the example before us. Mr. Samson's so-called "Danse" is by no means that which the term generally implies. It is a piece full of poetry; it is as picturesque as a Norwegian scene of fiord and mountain; and its quaint themes are treated with the skill of a musician. If, therefore, anybody weary of ordinary morceaux de salon wants to break fresh ground, regale himself with unhackneyed melodic forms, and, in the truest sense, enlarge his repertory, here is a chance of doing so.

Concerto for Pianoforte. Composed circa 1770 by John Christian Bach (Op. 13); arranged by Haydn; first published in 1790. New Edition, edited and revised by Edmund H. Turpin. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. TURPIN has rendered good service to pianoforte students by bringing under notice this highly characteristic specimen of what may be termed an antiquated style, for in it may clearly be discerned the germ of much that we find more amply developed in modern music. John Christian Bach ("Bach of London," as he was popularly called) was well known as a fashionable writer, but although he composed a quantity of light music (unworthy perhaps of the great name he bore) he was a man of undoubted talent, and the composition before us may be accepted as a very fair example of his earnest writing. Many of the passages shadow forth the brilliant style which grew so rapidly after his time; and the Finale, introducing the Scotch air, "The yellow-haired laddie," might almost pass as a recently published "teaching piece." The present edition is clearly printed; and being carefully revised and in many places fingered by Mr. Turpin, should be warmly welcomed by all musicians who take a real interest in the history of their art.

La Campanella. Morceau pour Piano. Composé par Carl Hause.

Gavotte and Bourrée for the Pianoforte. Composed by Otto Booth.

Pendant la Valse. Caprice pour le Pianoforte. Par Ernest Stoeger. [Neumeyer and Co.]

THE small and unpretentious piece which stands first on our list may be commended to pianists as an elegant trifle for drawing-room performance; but there is nothing sufficiently novel in design to arrest attention. The feeling of the title of the composition, too, is but feebly carried out. Mr. Otto Booth's "Gavotte and Bourrée" have a genuine flavour of the old dances quite refreshing, and are entitled to rank somewhat above the average modern specimens of this class of composition. The Gavotte is extremely tuneful; and the harmonies always appropriate and carefully written. The Bourrée we like even better, not only on account of its melodious character, but because the writing throughout is musicianlike without being pedantic, and the traditional feeling of the dance is never lost sight of. "Pendant la Valse" reminds us very much in its principal subject of Wely's well-known piece, "Les Cloches du Monastère"; but it is an effective little sketch, and will be found a good study for touch. The "Intermezzo," having a legato theme, with a flowing accompaniment, contrasts well with the opening melody; and the piece is on the whole well worth the attention of amateur pianists who are searching for novelty.

The Evening Tide. Song. Words and music by M. Davidson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE can be no question that in the present day, for one song expressive of joy and life, we have twenty expressive of grief and death. That the latter is infinitely easier to write must be an admitted truth, since mournful words spoken to mournful notes are sure to lay hold of the feelings of those who have not trained themselves to be moved by the eloquence of real music; but art in the meantime suffers; and we shall be glad therefore to welcome a reaction in the choice of words especially intended to be sung in drawing-rooms. "The Evening Tide" will assuredly please those who like dismal songs, for the music, although evidently the work of an amateur, is appropriate, and, with few exceptions, grammatically written. To sing about "your dead love's cold form washed ashore," is perhaps, as we have indicated, scarcely at all desirable before a mixed audience; but if it must be done, the simple setting of this song may be pronounced sufficiently sympathetic with the words.

The Key Table set to Music. By John Adcock. [Weekes and Co.]

WE have never held the opinion that the rudiments of music can be taught by songs, games, or arbitrary words repeated backwards or forwards, according to the system advocated by the disciples of what is termed "artificial memory"; and certainly Mr. Adcock's little musical sheet now before us does not alter our conviction. When a pupil is told, for example, that sharp keys rise by fifths—G, D, A, E, &c., he has only to learn this rule, and the order is easily remembered; but when he has mastered Mr. Adcock's song—which by the way, musically speaking, is by no means bad—he is extremely likely to forget it in a week; or, unless he can accurately recollect how many bars he has sung, to name too many or too few sharps or flats in a key. There is some connection in the words "Good Deeds Are Ever Bearing Fruit," the initials of which show the succession of six out of the seven key-notes with sharps; but certainly "Fruit Bearing Ever Are Deeds Good" is not a very intelligible sentence to impress the order of flat keys upon the memory, not to dwell upon the fact of its also being incorrect. We must dissent, too, from the wording of the following sentence: "Each sharp added to the signature raises the key-note a fifth"; assuredly it should be, "the key-note being raised a fifth adds one sharp to the signature." It may be said that we are hypercritical in our remarks; but it must be recollected that if the elementary part of music is vaguely taught at first, it is exceedingly difficult to carry a pupil forward with any satisfaction, and still more difficult to go back and make the foundation more secure. No vocalist or pianist can be grounded in the principles of his art without being trained to think; and Mr. Adcock's method by appealing to the memory, rather than the reason, is a tacit protest against this fact.

MAY is rather a late month to publish a Calendar for the year; but as the first title of the above work is doubtless a more important feature, its tardy appearance is perhaps of little consequence. Indeed, it must be said that the "Calendar," being compressed into the smallest possible space, might now almost as well be omitted; for everybody has an almanac ready at hand which will, assuredly, give him a little information about the "red-letter" days in the year, a matter of some moment to a professional man. Every praise, however, must be given to the Directory, not only for its accuracy, but for the manner in which it is arranged. The alphabetical list of London and country Professors of Music combined will be found extremely useful for reference, those residing in London alone being distinguished by a *. Hitherto it has been difficult to find the name of a country Professor, unless it was previously known in what part of England he lived. Not only is this objection here removed, but there is also a trade list on the same plan, and a repetition of each list under the heading of the towns. The Academies, Colleges and Institutions, Musical Societies, Cathedrals, Collegiate Churches and Chapels, are likewise to be found duly chronicled in this valuable work, carefully compiled lists of all the officials connected with the cathedrals being given. Our only objection to the plan of the book is that the advertisements are occasionally mixed up with the portion devoted to the Directory. In fact, at page 167, we at first imagined that the work was concluded, and were surprised to find the Trade Directory about half-a-dozen pages further on. This might easily be remedied in next year's issue of the book.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THERE has been no operatic novelty produced during the last few weeks at Paris, the performances of opera having been limited to two establishments,—viz., the National Opera and the Opéra-Comique. At the former, the répertoire has been chiefly occupied with representations of "Freischütz," "Don Giovanni," and "Le Roi de Lahore;" while at the Opéra-Comique, "Zauberflöte," "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine," "Les Noces de Jeannette," and "Les Diamants de la Couronne," have been the principal attractions. On the other hand, Parisian audiences have had repeated opportunities recently of hearing the music of the entire first act of Wagner's "Lohengrin," which M. Pasdeloup had included in the programme of the last "Concert Populaire," and which, in spite of the traditional opposition offered by a portion of the audience, was well received. Encouraged by this success, the performance has recently been repeated at the Cirque d'Hiver before a very numerous and appreciative audience, and thus the way would seem to be prepared to a more general appreciation of the music of the German reformer in France.

M. Vaucorbeil has been definitively nominated managing director of the Paris Grand-Opéra, in the room of M. Halanzier, and will, it is said, at once assume his functions. One of his first proceedings, no doubt, will be to pay a visit to London in order to enter into fresh engagements with the French vocal artists at present in our midst, some of whom had refused to accept new contracts with the French national establishment under the old régime. Among the operatic works in view at the Grand-Opéra for the coming season are mentioned a new Opera by M. Gounod, entitled "Le Tribut de Zamora;" "Sigurd," by M. Reyer; "Herodiade," by M. Massenet; "Le Roi d'Ys," and "Fiesque," by M. Lalo; "Le Feu," by M. Guiraud; and "François de Rimini," by M. Ambroise Thomas; Gluck's "Armide" will also most likely be remounted. M. Regnier has been appointed by the new director to a post expressly made for the veteran comedian, that of Directeur des Etudes. To explain this nomination it will be sufficient to remark that in France it is thought advisable for lyric actors and actresses to learn to act as well as to sing.

The Paris correspondent of the Times, writing under date May 26, says: "M. Alex. Guilmant, the eminent Organist of Trinity Church and of the Conservatoire Concert Society, intends giving four organ concerts next month at the Trocadéro, with the assistance of celebrated artists. Among other compositions he will play (on the instrument so justly esteemed, built for the last Exhibition by Cavaillé-Coll) several unpublished pieces by Dietrich Buxtehude, one of the predecessors of Bach."

M. Saint-Saëns has set to music Victor Hugo's Ode "La Lyre et la Harpe," which will be produced at the approaching Birmingham Festival.

A Music-Festival is being organised by the Mozart Institution at Salzburg, in which the members of the Viennese Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Herr Hans Richter, will take part. The performances will take place at the end of next month. Under the direction of the same eminent orchestral leader, the production, on four consecutive evenings, of the entire Tetralogy, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," was announced to take place at the end of last month at the Imperial Opera of Vienna, where the separate dramas constituting the work had already been previously given.

Spontini's Opera "Olympia" will be revived on the occasion of the celebration of the "golden wedding" of their Imperial Majesties at Berlin. The work was first produced at the Prussian capital in 1821, being intended on the part of the partisans of Italian Opera (as readers of C. M. von Weber's biography will remember) to counteract the movement in favour of German National Opera set on foot by "Der Freischütz."

Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" is gradually becoming known to Italian audiences, and, after having been performed recently both at Milan and Rome, will also shortly be produced by the Società Orchestrale at Florence.

At the Court Theatre of Weimar an Opera in one act, entitled "Lindoro," has just been performed with some success, the composer being Madame Héritte-Viardot.

Herr Ignaz Brüll has completed a new Opera entitled "Bianca," which will be brought out by the Imperial Opera of Vienna in December next.

At Munich the first performance of M. Gounod's Opera "Le Roi de Lahore" will shortly take place, on which occasion King Louis, as is his custom, will be the sole audience.

A new comic Opera, in three acts, from the pen of Herr Max Wolf, entitled "Cesarine," has met with a good reception at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theater at Berlin. Herr Weissheimer's Opera, "Meister Martin der Küfer," recently produced at Carlsruhe, has now also been performed at Baden-Baden, and was again extremely well received.

Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" has recently been performed by the Rühl'sche Gesangverein at Frankfurt, in the presence of the composer, who of course became the object of a general ovation.

The well-known Riedel'sche Gesangverein of Leipzig has just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation with a performance of sacred music at the church of St. Thomas.

The Music-Festival of the Middle Rhine will take place this year at Mannheim, under the direction of Herr Vincenz Lachner, among the works selected for performance being Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht," Haydn's "Creation," and Brahms's Second Symphony.

Herr Bilse, the eminent Berlin Conductor, is engaged upon a concert-tournée, with his orchestra, in Northern Germany, while Herr Mansfeldt, of Dresden, with his staff of fifty orchestral performers, is about to start for Warsaw, where he has been engaged for a series of concerts.

Herr Julius Stockhausen, it is rumoured, has resigned his post of professor at the newly-founded Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfurt, in consequence of a misunderstanding having arisen between him and the director of the institution, Herr Joachim Raff.

A commemorative tablet has been placed by the Viennese at the house wherein Lanner, the favourite composer of valses, was born in 1801.

Marcello Rossi, the eminent violinist, recently engaged upon a concert-tournée in Germany, in company with Madame Desirée Artot, has met with a brilliant success.

Halévy's "La Juive" has reached its hundredth, and Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," its two hundredth performance at the Berlin Opera.

At the Moscow Conservatoire a new Opera by Peter Tschaikoffsky, viz., "Eugen Onegin," was performed by the pupils of the institution in the presence of the composer and Anton Rubinstein. The last season of Italian opera at Moscow has, it is stated, resulted in a deficit of 270,000 roubles.

A new theatre is being constructed at Florence which is to be called Teatro Nazionale, and will exceed in dimensions that of La Scala in Milan.

MM. Mangeot frères, of Nancy, have presented one of their newly invented pianofortes à claviers renversés, which attracted so much curiosity during the late Paris Exhibition, to the Royal Conservatoire of Brussels. The Belgian Home Secretary, in acknowledging the gift, expresses the opinion "that the invention will occupy an important place in the history of the improvement of the instrument, and will modify completely the conditions of modern pianoforte-playing."

At the institution just mentioned, a new class is being opened for instruction in practical harmony and accompaniment; MM. Emile Mathieu and Gustave Sandré are mentioned as candidates for the professorship.

The death is announced, at Dessau, of Franz Diener, the gifted tenor singer, who had commenced his career as a member of the orchestra of the Krollsche Theater at Berlin, and who had subsequently achieved a great reputation as interpreter of leading parts in Wagner's operas.

At Paris died, at the age of twenty-nine, Victor Nant, musical professor at the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles, and an Organist of considerable attainments. He was blind from his birth.

C. Schunke, a celebrated virtuoso on the horn, and professor of that instrument at the Berlin "Hochschule," died at the age of seventy at the Prussian capital.

The composer and professor of the St. Petersburgh Conservatoire, Nicolai de Zaremba, died at the Russian capital; most of the younger generation of Russian composers of note had been his pupils.

The death is also announced at Rome of Gottfried Semper, the eminent architect of the two Dresden opera-houses, viz., the one destroyed by fire some years ago, and the present handsome building. He was seventy-six years of age.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts, recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

"LEGER" OR "LEDGER" LINES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In making some slight researches into the origin and history of this musical term, I believe I have detected a curious etymological error existing in all our dictionaries and cyclopædias, of which I have consulted above fifty, both English and American. In all of these the derivation is referred to the French word léger, light, trifling, frivolous. Now this is hardly satisfactory. A ledger line has never been typographically either lighter in shade or thinner in substance than its accompanying stave lines, and the note written upon it can scarcely be considered of less importance than its fellows within the stave. Moreover, we should expect a similar use of the word in the supposed original French, whereas its equivalent is simply "lignes postiches." The English word ledger (Ang.-Sax. leegan, Dutch leggen) conveys the notion of position, something that is laid, and at present has three significations, one commercial and two architectural. There is also a nearly obsolete form "lieger," chiefly applied to an ambassador who continues to remain in one appointment. In commerce, a ledger is the chief account-book, which usually lies on the counting-house desk. In architecture, a ledger denotes, firstly, a large stone which lies over the whole of a tomb, and, secondly, the horizontal poles of a scaffold which are attached to the standards, and which lie parallel to each other and to the edifice in course of erection, and it is from the latter that I believe our musical term to have been adopted. A builder finding his scaffold of insufficient height, adds another "ledger," and a musician having reached the top G of his stave, and wishing to go still higher, adds a "ledger line," which simply implies one lying beyond the stave.

The word seems to have been first employed in a musical sense about 1700. It occurs neither in Morley nor in Christopher Simpson, neither is it in any of the editions of Playford's "Introduction" up to 1694, all of which state that any additional lines required may be added by the pen, but in the edition of 1703 they are spoken of as being commonly called "ledger lines." Now it was about this time that the violin was generally superseding the old treble viol, and the greater compass of the former instrument requiring increased stave accommodation, the additional lines employed bearing so striking an analogy to the familiar "ledgers" of a scaffold, it is probable that this word was generally adopted. Our current word "layer" (stratum), derived from the High instead of the Low German, bears precisely the same signification, and we might speak of "layer lines" with as much propriety as we now do of "ledger."

THE ENGLISH MUSICAL PITCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Would you kindly give me the vibrational number of English musical pitch, and say what is the difference, if any, between normal and concert pitch.

French pitch, which I understand to give 261 vibrations for middle C, is supposed to be lower than English. In Novello's Music Primer, "Scientific Basis," mention is made of the 32-feet pipe of the Albert Hall organ making 16 vibrations; this would give 256 for middle C, and of course lower than French pitch.—Yours truly,

J. C. G.

3, Parkside Place, Edinburgh, April 30, 1879.

[The vibration-number of the French diapason normal for A is given at 870 single or 435 double oscillations per second. In consequence of some determinations made by Mr. Alex J. Ellis, with the help of Appunn's reed tonometer, and which led to the belief that it had in reality 439, the question has been once more examined. It appears that the original standard was very nearly, if not quite, correct. Helmholtz, as quoted by M. Rudolph Kœnig, made it 435·01, only differing by one unit in the second place of decimals from the official estimate. The English "concert pitch" on the other hand has no precise meaning. It exists only in the practice of different orchestras, and even there varies with the individual players and with the temperature. Messrs. Broadwood have obtained a good average, which they issue as the highest of three, the lowest being the French normal, and that intermediate approximating to the standard proposed by the Society of Arts. The highest of these gives about 542 vibrations for C, according to Mr. Ellis's table, which however requires to be corrected for the too high number (about four vibrations per second) at which he stated the French normal pitch. The pitch of 256 for middle C, or 512 for its octave, named by our correspondent, is theoretical. It has the advantage of rising by powers of 2, but I am not aware that it is in actual use, except by Tonic Solfaists; certainly not in the Albert Hall organ, which is very slightly above Messrs. Broadwood's concert pitch.—ED. Musical Times.]

THE MONOTONE AND SPEAKING VOICE IN CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Relative to the above subject, will you kindly allow me space for a few remarks?

In your last issue, your correspondent, Mr. A. C. A. Drought, mentions three different ways in which the service should be performed: (1) Fully choral; (2) monotoned; (3) simply spoken. While agreeing as to the whole service being consistently rendered, and well able to appreciate and enjoy a well-performed choral service, I differ from Mr. Drought in the belief that the "incongruous mixture" of reading the prayers and singing the responses is either disagreeable or distracting.

In the church where I have been for some time a member of the choir and assistant organist, we have what some may be pleased to call a "piebald" service. The clergyman reads his part, but the congregation and choirs sing all the responses and versicles of Morning and Evening Prayer, Litany, and Communion Service; every Amen is sung; the Creeds are always intoned with organ accompaniment (ad. lib.); and yet I have often been struck by the hearty manner in which the congregation take part in the service.

The difficulties in having a "fully choral" service are twofold:—

(1) It very often happens that the clergyman has no musical talent; and I consider the way in which I have often heard the priest's part sung by unmusical incumbents a great infliction on any congregation. This difficulty is often extended by the smallness of the parish or the poorness of the district, and the consequent inability on the part of the clergyman to obtain a curate, who, perchance, might be equally unmusical.

(2) Some members of a congregation, who perhaps like the singing, and themselves join in it, are very much opposed to a "singing parson;" they seem to cling to the notion that it is the clergyman's place to read, and for them to sing. Now, a clergyman may not be in a position, nor is it always desirable, to disregard entirely the feelings—foibles though they may be—of his flock.

Now, on the principle that "half a loaf is better than no bread," I would rather keep what music we have—for it is worth keeping—than sweep it away because we can have no more. And such a service, far from being disagreeable and distracting, may be conducted "decently and in order," and to the "praise and glory of God."

I remain, Sir, faithfully yours,

J. FREDERIC HAMLYN.

GAS-ENGINES FOR ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In "THE MUSICAL TIMES" of May 1, 1879, "Correspondent" asks, "Are gas-engines being used for filling wind chests of organs, and if so, where can one be seen so applied in or near London?"

In reply, there is an engine (Hugon's patent) at Denmark Hill, Camberwell; another in the Vassall Road, Brixton; another at the Savoy Chapel, in the Strand; and there is a gas-engine of a much more simple construction, which would work an organ-bellows equally well as the three above-named engines, at the Patent Office Museum, South Kensington.

The organ bellows in York Minster is worked by a gas-engine (Hugon's patent)—these engines are a very good substitute where hydraulic pressure cannot be obtained, and are much cheaper in the working.

Probably any of the London engines above alluded to might be seen on a proper introduction.

Yours respectfully,

May 12, 1879. ——— S. N. BARBER.

A PLEA FOR THE FLUTE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I read with interest the letter of your correspondent, the writer of "A Plea for the Flute," in your number for May, and I in a great measure concur in what he says. But I demur to his advocacy of an instrument tuned on the principle of the equal temperament, and I would ask you to allow me space to urge the desirability of aiming at a higher standard. In point of tone I am with Mr. Poole in what he says in favour of the flute. If in this respect the flute may compare not unfavourably even with the violin, does it not seem a lamentable retrogression that the efforts, in a great measure successful, which were made by Siccama to render the flute capable of as true intonation as the violin, should be ignored?

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

Alvington, Torquay, May 13, 1879. A. J. CORRIE.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERNANT.—A Concert was held at Bethesda Independent Chapel on Monday evening, the 5th ult., by the scholars of the Sunday School and the choir of the chapel, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Thomas. The chair was taken by Mr. William Watkins. The first part of the concert was miscellaneous, and the second part was devoted to a performance of the Cantata Samuel, by H. Davies, A. C., Ruabon. The vocalists were Miss Harries, Miss Jenkins, Mrs. Phelps, Mr. William Thomas, and Mr. Henry Thomas. The performance of Samuel gave great satisfaction. Miss Phelps and Mr. A. M. James, R.A.M., presided at the harmoniums. Credit is due to Mr. H. Thomas for instructing the choir so well.

ARUNDEL.—A Concert was given on the 12th ult. by the Chichester Vocal Union, the Misses Osmond, Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. A well-selected programme was gone through in excellent style. Mr. E. Osmond acted as accompanist.

BANBURY.—Mr. G. A. Hardacre gave his second Chamber Concert on the 17th ult. at the Town Hall, assisted by Miss E. Lloyd, Mr. R. B. Belcher, and Mr. R. Blythe. The programme included Trios in D (Beethoven), in G (Hummel), and in C (Spohr). Air varié from "Serenade," and Kreutzer Sonata (Beethoven); also songs by Anderton, Braga, and Mozart, charmingly rendered by Miss Lloyd.

BANFF.—On Thursday evening, the 22nd ult., an evening Concert was given in the County Hall, by the Banff Musical Association, which was highly successful. The concert was conducted by Herr J. Hoffmann. The first part was miscellaneous, one of the most successful pieces being a vocal solo, "The sunshine follows the rain," sung by Miss M. Gordon, composed by Herr Hoffmann. The second part was devoted to Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, The May Queen. The Misses Williamson and Simpson presided at the piano, and Miss K. Martin at the harmonium, the soloists being Mrs. Barclay, Miss M. Gordon, Mr. A. Simpson, and Mr. Mitchell.

BECKENHAM.—Two highly successful Concerts were given at Christ Church Lecture Hall, on April 29 and the 15th ult., by a choir of local amateurs, in aid of the Parish Church Organ Fund. The programme consisted of an admirable selection of madrigals, glees, part-songs, and vocal and instrumental solos. Mozart's Trio, in E flat, for piano, violin, and viola, was well given by Messrs. Coles, F. S. Newcombe, and A. Carnall, Mus. Bac. Miss Kirby was heard to advantage in a new song, "My 'prentice lad," by A. Carnall (accompanied by the composer), as was also Mrs. Radcliffe in "The message;" both being encored. At the repetition Concert, on the 15th ult., the solos included Gounod's "Ave Maria" and Sullivan's "Lost chord" with violin and harmonium accompaniment, both of which had to be repeated. Mr. F. S. Newcombe accompanied the part-songs and glees on each occasion, and Mr. S. R. Coles conducted.

BEDFORD.—The second Concert of the thirteenth season of the Amateur Musical Society was held in the New Corn Exchange on Tuesday, the 13th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, The May Queen. The band, largely increased by professional aid from London, was the best that has assisted at any of the Society's Concerts. The choruses were very steadily given by the choir, the variations of tone being well marked. The tenor songs were sung by Mr. Harper Kearton with great taste and refinement. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, the vocalists were Miss K. Baxter, Miss Spiller, and Mr. Kearton. A part-song of Mendelssohn's served to show the good training of the choir, the light and shade being well observed, and the "Jubilee" overture (Weber) brought to a close a most enjoyable concert. Mr. Diemer conducted with his usual ability.

BELFAST.—The members of the Belfast Choir gave at their concluding Concert of the season, in the Music Hall, an excellent rendering of Schumann's charming work The Pilgrimage of the Rose. The solos were well sung by members of the Society. Gade's Comala formed the second part of the programme. The choruses in this work were finely sung, the tone of the first tenors being worthy of all praise. The part of Comala was excellently interpreted by a lady who has done good service on former occasions. Mr. J. S. Firth's accompaniments on the pianoforte were most sympathetic, and Mr. E. Cooney, at the harmonium, brought out the different orchestral effects. The whole was under the conductorship of Mr. F. C. Smythe, Mus. B., who deserves great credit for the success of the entire performance.

BERKHAMPSTEAD.—Two Organ Recitals were given at the Parish Church by Mr. James Turpin on April 29, the programmes of which were of a thoroughly classical character. The object of the performance was to collect donations towards a fund for enlarging the organ by the addition of a third row of keys; and it is gratifying to record that the contributions were most liberal.

BIRMINGHAM.—At Mr. Stockley's third and last Subscription Orchestral Concert in the Town Hall, Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1. in C, the Overtures, Meeresstille (Mendelssohn), and Jessonda (Spohr), were the principal items in the programme. A Concert Overture, As you like it, composed expressly for these Concerts by Mr. Hubert W. Wareing, a local artist who distinguished himself as a student at Leipzig, was performed with success. The work is of considerable merit, and still greater promise. Mr. Abbott gave a good rendering of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. The vocalists were Madame Antoinette Sterling and Mr. Redfern Hollins. The members of the Amateur Harmonic Association also took part in the Concert, singing some part-songs with excellent effect. Mr. Rowland Winn accompanied, and Mr. Stockley conducted.——The Annual Concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 8th ult. The programme included two movements from Beethoven's Symphony in D, Op. 36, Auber's Overture Le Maçon, Mendelssohn's Cornelius March, Haydn's Bear Symphony, Mozart's Overture, Idomeneo—the last two performed for the first time in Birmingham—some slight pieces, and an attractive March by the Conductor. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna and Mr. Joseph Maas, who were enthusiastically received, and frequently encored. Mr. W. Astley Langston accompanied with taste and skill, and the amateur orchestra was under the able direction of its honorary conductor, Mr. Duchemin. The Concert was given in aid of the Queen's Hospital, and was most successful in every way.—— A Chamber Concert in connection with the Royal Society of Artists took place at their rooms on Saturday, the 10th ult. The programme comprised Haydn's Quartett, Op. 76, No. 3, Bennett's Sestett. Op. 8, and Mendelssohn's Sestett, Op. 110. The executants were Messrs. Ward and Abbott (violins), Mr. Roden (violoncello), Mr. T. Heath (contrabasso), and Mrs. Hale (pianoforte); the lady also contributing solos. Miss S. Ambler, of the Royal Academy of Music, was the vocalist, and Mr. C. J. Stevens accompanied.——On the 22nd ult., Mr. Frank H. Bradley gave a Concert in the Town Hall, the programme of which was devoted to the works of Rubinstein. The Misses Robertson and Messrs. Piercey and Young sang various songs and duets, and Mr. Bradley, with the assistance of Mr. Abbott (violin), and Mr. Owen (violoncello), played the Sonata, Op. 13, and two movements of the Trio, Op. 15, No. 2; and with Mr. H. W. Wareing, at a second piano, the Concerto in E minor, Op. 25. Mr. Rowland Winn accompanied. ——The fourth, and last, of the Mayor's Free Concerts was given in the Town Hall, on Saturday, the 24th ult., and was highly appreciated. The programmes have been judiciously chosen, and the Concerts well carried out under the experienced guidance of Mr. W. C. Stockley.

BOLTON-LE-MOORS.—On Sunday afternoon, April 27, the new Organ in the Congregational Church, Belmont, was opened by Mr. S. W. Pilling, of Bolton. The sermon on the occasion was preached before a large congregation by the Rev. C. A. Berry. Special voluntaries from the works of Wesley, Lemmens, Handel, and other composers were well selected to display the qualities of the instrument. The builders are Messrs. Alex. Young and Sons, of Manchester.

BRECHIN.—The second Concert of the season was given by the Brechin Amateur Musical Society in the Mechanics' Hall on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult. The first part of the concert consisted of Sir Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, a pastoral Cantata which is rapidly rising in popularity. The choruses were admirably rendered. The solo and concerted numbers for the May Queen, the Lover, Robin Hood, and the Queen—were performed by four amateurs with great taste and feeling. The Cantata was accompanied throughout by piano and organ, at which two young ladies presided with great ability. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous. Miss Hempel, of Perth, contributed songs with great success. The duties of Conductor were ably performed by Mr. Smith; and at the close of the concert votes of thanks were awarded to the choir, the Conductor, and to Miss Crabb for her admirable, efficient, and generous assistance as accompanist throughout the season.

BRIGHTON.—The members of Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir recently presented their Conductor, Mr. Alfred King, Mus. Bac., Oxon., with a silver salver, in token of their appreciation of his kindness and courtesy. The salver bore the following inscription: "Presented to Alfred King, Mus. Bac., Oxon., their Conductor, by the members of Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir, Brighton, April, 1879."

BRISTOL.—On Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., the closing meeting of Mr. Greenwood's Choir for the present season was held at St. James' Barton School-room, when an interesting presentation was made to the Conductor, Mr. James Greenwood. Mr. S. Gane, Hon. Sec., in opening the proceedings, remarked that the results attending the object for which the Society was formed, viz., to give Concerts in aid of charitable objects, had been highly successful, the net proceeds exceeding a total amount of £450. The gift consisted of a writing-table, which was supplied by Mr. C. Trapnell, of College Green, and is in every respect a first-class specimen of cabinet work. A silver plate is fixed to the table, bearing the following inscription: "Presented by the members of 'Mr. Greenwood's choir' to their Conductor (Mr. James Greenwood), as a memento of their regard. Bristol, May 13, 1879." Mrs. Lawrence (a member of the Choir), in an appropriate address on behalf of the Society, presented the cabinet to Mr. Greenwood as a mark of their great respect for him in the double character of their friend and Conductor, and after a few words of thanks from Mr. Greenwood the meeting separated.——The Concert for the benefit of the widow and children of the late Inspector Riordan, of the Bristol Police force, was given at the Colston Hall, on the 19th ult. Amongst the artists who kindly gave their services were Madame Bretelle, Miss Kate Hayes, Miss Clements, Miss Kate Probert, Madame Pattie Keate, Mr. Williams, and Mr. H. J. Dyer. In addition to a full orchestra, band, and chorus, led by Mr. F. Watts, and conducted by Mr. Augustus Simmons, the Police band, under their able Conductor, Mr. T. Glover, contributed valuable aid. The programme was miscellaneous, and contained some effective orchestral works excellently played by the Police band, and several vocal pieces, all of which were well received, especially Madame Pattie Keate's "O rest in the Lord," Madame Bretelle's "With verdure clad," and Miss Kate Hayes's "There is a green hill." Great credit is due to Mr. A. Simmons and Mr. S. Bryant, the promoters of the concert, which will beyond doubt realise a handsome sum for the object in view.——The last of Mr. George Riseley's excellent series of Monday Popular Concerts for the present season was given in the Colston Hall. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Beethoven's Concerto in E flat (The Emperor) for piano and orchestra, the solo instrument being presided at by Mr. R. W. W. Bampfylde, R.A.M. The Overture to Le Nozze di Figaro, the last two movements of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, and Scotson Clark's "Marche aux Flambeaux," all of which were splendidly performed by Mr. Riseley's band. Songs were also contributed by Madame Eva Scorey, Mr. John Child, and Mr. Kempton. Mr. A. W. Waite led the band.

CHELTENHAM.—At the open Concert of the Musical Society on Thursday evening, the 15th ult., in the Winter Garden, the music selected for performance was Barnett's Cantata, The Ancient Mariner, and a selection from the opera of Semiramide. Mr. Montagu Shepherd, the Rev. W. Duncombe, of Hereford Cathedral, Miss Dunn, and Madame Gonez were the solo vocalists in the Cantata, and Mrs. Daubeny, Mr. Shepherd, the Rev. Hattersley Smith, and the Rev. Churchill Baxter in the selection from Semiramide. The choral music was fairly executed, an excellent band supporting the whole. The performances were conducted by Mr. A. E. Dyer, to whose valuable assistance the success of the concert may be fairly ascribed.

CHORLTON-CUM-HARDY, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Monday, the 5th ult., the Chorlton-cum-Hardy Amateur Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Thomas Oxley, gave a special Concert in the Hall of the new National Schools, in aid of the building fund of that institution. The vocalists were Miss Little, Mrs. Hughes, Mrs. Nixon, Miss Barningham, Mr. Deakin, Mr. Nixon, and Mr. R. Barningham. A pianoforte duet was brilliantly performed by Miss Alice Barningham and Miss Worthington, and elicited an enthusiastic encore. The programme also comprised a selection of glees.

COLCHESTER.—Special Services were held on Friday, the 23rd ult., in St. Nicholas Church, the occasion being the opening of the organ recently erected by Messrs. Morten and Taylor, of Regent's Park, London. Sermons were preached, in the morning, by Bishop Claughton, and, in the evening, by the Rev. Flavel S. Cook. Mr.

Groom, Organist of the church, accompanied the services, after which Mr. C. S. Jekyll, of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, played an excellent selection of music, which well displayed the fine quality of the various registers. The services were very successful, and Mr. Jekyll's Recital gave great pleasure to a large and appreciative audience.

CRIEFF, N.B.—The first season of the Crieff Musical Association was brought to a most successful close in the Masons' Hall, on Tuesday, April 29, when an evening Concert was given to a numerous audience. The programme consisted of a selection of vocal and instrumental music, solo and concerted. The principal vocalists were Miss Thorn, Miss Davidson, and Mr. F. D. Ferguson. The anthem, "Awake, put on thy strength" (Dalglish); and the part-songs, "The Lark" (Mendelssohn), and "The Curfew" (Smart), were particularly well rendered by the choir. Messrs. Ferguson and Campbell (violins), Mr. Bain (violoncello), and Miss A. Campbell (piano), won a well-deserved encore by their performance of the "Gipsy Rondo" (Haydn). Miss Helen Porteous played the accompaniments in the first part of the programme, and displayed much power of execution in a pianoforte solo "Hilarité" (Weber), and a duet "Marches Militaires" (Schubert), with Miss Miller, who was accompanist in the second part. The Conductors were Messrs. Simpson and Edington, to whom much credit is due for the pains they have taken in the training of the singers.

DEAL.—A very successful performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah was given at a complimentary Concert to Dr. Longhurst, on Thursday the 8th ult. The solo parts were ably sustained by Miss McEwen, Madame Poole, Mr. Ashley Foster, Mr. Probert, Mr. Rhodes, and Mr. Moir. The choruses were well sung by the members of the Deal and Walmer Harmonic Union.

DURHAM.—On Friday evening, the 16th ult., the second evening Concert of the Durham Philharmonic Society was held in the Town Hall. This Society was only founded last year, and was placed under the conductorship of Mr. Daniel Whitehead, of Durham Cathedral. The programme comprised an excellent selection of vocal and instrumental music, the band consisting of about twenty performers. Miss E. Cary Walker was the principal vocalist, and acquitted herself in the most admirable manner. The part songs were exceedingly well rendered.

EDINBURGH.—A Concert took place in the Music Hall on the 19th ult., important from the class of music performed. The programme comprised The Passion (Haydn), God's time is the best (Bach), and Mendelssohn's Festgesang. There was a choir of fifty voices, unusually well balanced, and including many of the best solo and chorus singers in the city. Mr. Henry Hartley was at the organ, Mr. Bridgman at the piano, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted. The soloists were Miss Grey (alto), Mr. Banks (tenor), and Mr. Glencorse (bass).

FARNWORTH, NEAR BOLTON.—An Organ Recital was given on May-day in the Market Street Congregational Church, by Mr. Eccles, of Darwen. In addition to a well-arranged programme the Organist played Mendelssohn's Wedding March in honour of the anniversary of the wedding of the Rev. W. Hewgill, M.A., pastor of the church. The vocal pieces were conducted by A. Barnes, Esq., B.A.

GATESHEAD.—The first Concert of the Fell Amateur Vocal Society was given on Thursday evening, the 1st ult., in the National School, Low Fell. Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, The May Queen, occupied the first part of the programme, and the second part was devoted to the performance of a judicious selection of solos and part-songs. The choruses, sung by the members of the Society, were, on the whole, rendered in a highly efficient manner, reflecting much credit upon the training of the Conductor, Mr. Edwin J. Rowley.

GREENOCK.—Mr. Poulter and his choir gave a very agreeable Concert in the Picture Gallery of the Watt Institute on the 19th ult. The programme was divided into two parts, sacred and secular. The singing of the choir was very satisfactory, showing good training. Mr. Poulter conducted and accompanied throughout with care and judgment.

HADLEIGH.—The Annual Concert was given by the Choral Society on the 2nd ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The principal feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, which was admirably rendered. The principal soloists were Miss A. Aylward, R.A.M., Miss Broome, Messrs. Hitchcock and H. G. Hardacre. The accompaniments were ably performed by Messrs. C. Cooke (violin), T. Pratt (viola),—Pratt (cello), and Miss Hardacre (piano). Mr. G. A. Hardacre conducted.

HALIFAX.—On Thursday, the 15th ult., a vocal and instrumental Concert was given in the Dean Clough Institute, in aid of the restoration of the Pelham Lane Baptist Chapel, which was recently destroyed by fire. The band of the 8th West York Artillery was present, and gave a choice selection of music with their accustomed ability. The vocalists were Miss S. L. Smith, Miss Emily Empsall, Mr. Buckland, and Mr. Schofield. Master Joe Kershaw gave two violin solos, and Mr. W. F. Illingworth two pianoforte solos. Mr. W. H. Whitaker accompanied on the piano with his wonted ability.

HIGHER TRANMERE, BIRKENHEAD.—On the 1st ult., a lecture, in connection with St. Catherine's Church Institute, on "Handel, his Life and Music," was given in the Drill Hall by the Rev. C. J. Langley, M.A., Curate. The Vicar, the Rev. M. L. J. Mortimer, presided. There was a large and attentive audience, and the lecture was ably illustrated by the following vocalists: Miss Sandell, Miss Dalin, Mr. R. R. Ambler, Mr. R. E. C. Batty, and Mr. Hugh Pierce. The lecturer was pianist. The usual vote of thanks closed the entertainment, which it was gratifying to see so highly appreciated.

ILFRACOMBE.—The members of the Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Judas Maccabæus on Thursday evening, the 8th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. B. P. Willis. Miss Francis presided at the piano. The solo vocalists were Mdlle. Sherrington, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Sinkins.

JARROW.—On Tuesday evening, April 29th, Handel's Messiah was performed in the Mechanics' Hall by a selected choir of upwards of 120 voices, accompanied by an efficient band. The solos were taken by Miss Julia Sydney, soprano; Mr. G. J. Leatham, alto; Mr. D. Whitehead, tenor; and Mr. R. Nutton, bass; the gentlemen being from Durham Cathedral. Mr. J. Hickman officiated as conductor, and to him is due the credit of the successful execution of the Oratorio. There was a large and appreciative audience.

JEDBURGH, N.B.—On May-day evening, the second Annual Concert by the pupils of St. John's School was given at the Corn Exchange Hall. The youthful vocalists performed, with great expression and accuracy, the duet "O lovely peace," and air and duet, "Come, ever-smiling liberty" (Judas Maccabæus), Sir H. R. Bishop's round, "Hark! 'tis the Indian drum," &c. Several solos were also sung in excellent taste, and some instrumental pieces were executed with a wonderful degree of precision and finish; two duets for harmonium and pianoforte, by Masters Beattie and Hartley, the Kyrie from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and Mendelssohn's Wedding March, being especially worthy of mention. All the performers were the pupils of Mr. Lunn, head-teacher of the school.

KINGSBRIDGE.—On Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., the Kingsbridge Vocal Association brought their winter's session to a close, by giving an evening Concert in the Town Hall. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The May Queen was the pièce de résistance, with Miss José Sherrington as the May Queen, Miss Emily Dones as the Queen, Mr. Henry Guy as the Lover, and Mr. Farley Sinkins as Robin Hood. Mrs. Squire presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. T. Craddock at the harmonium, Mr. B. Willis was solo flute, and Mr. Squire conducted. The choruses throughout were given with precision of time and readiness of attack, showing the careful training of the Conductor during the past session. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection.

LAUNCESTON.—The members of the Launceston Philharmonic Union, started a few months ago, gave their first Concert on Friday evening, the 16th ult. The performance was an unqualified success, reflecting the greatest credit on the members, the accompanist (Mr. C. Hayman), and its Conductor (Mr. Dalby, Organist of St. Mary Magdalene, Launceston). The programme consisted of a selection from Handel's Messiah, part-songs, glees, &c., and pianoforte and harmonium duets.

LEWISHAM.—The Orchestral Society brought its third season to a close on Saturday the 3rd ult. There have been three Concerts given during the season, the evenings being devoted to the performance of high-class music. At the General Meeting of the Society, the report stated that the number of members had increased during the past season, and the accounts showed a satisfactory state of finance. A special vote of thanks was passed to the Conductor of the Society, Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

LEYTONSTONE.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. Albert E. Bishop, Organist of St. Mary Abchurch, City, on Thursday evening, the 22nd ult., at Leytonstone Congregational Church. The programme included selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Smart, Merkel, Guilmant, &c., and was well calculated to display the good qualities of the instrument erected by Messrs. Foster and Andrews.

NEW SWINDON.—On Wednesday evening, the 14th ult., a Sacred Concert was given in the Hall of the Mechanics' Institute by the choir of the Landford Street Church, assisted by the New Swindon Choral Society. The programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus, and a selection from Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The principal parts were sustained by Madame Francis Brooke, Mr. Fred. Jenkins (Choirmaster of St. Mark's Church, New Swindon), and Mr. A. Thomas, of Gloucester Cathedral, all of whom rendered their parts very effectively, the duet, "'Love divine, all love excelling," sung by Mr. Jenkins and Madame Brooke, being especially good. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Jenkins and Mr. Albert Sykes (Conductor of the Choral Society). Effective assistance was rendered by Mrs. Grant, the Misses Lenox, Walker, Baines, and Laverick. Mr. Whitehead (Organist of Christ Church) presided at the harmonium, and Miss Nellie Sykes at the piano. The band and chorus numbered about 100 performers. Altogether, the concert was very successful.

NORTHAMPTON.—Mr. Brook Sampson gave a most successful Concert at the Town Hall on Thursday the 8th ult. The band, which was very efficient, was led by Mr. Twinn of Nottingham. Miss Billing presided at the piano during the first part, and Mr. Brook Sampson during the second. The soloists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Orridge, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Henry Cross, and Mr. Bartle. The first part consisted of selections from Mendelssohn's Oratorio St. Paul. The choruses were well sung by the members of the Choral Union. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous.

OXFORD.—The Chapel of Queen's College was crowded on the 15th ult. on the occasion of the first of the terminal Organ Recitals given by Mr. Dodds, B. Mus., Organist to that College. The programme was most varied and interesting, and comprised several items not previously heard in Oxford.——Mendelssohn's music to The Midsummer Night's Dream was performed in the Sheldonian Theatre on the 16th ult. The play was recited by Mr. Brandram, and the solos sung by the Misses Robertson. The band, led by Mr. Gibson, was good; the chorus was not.——The Professor of Music gave a most interesting lecture on "Ancient European Dance Music" in the same place on the 20th ult. He began by pointing out that rhythm was introduced into musical composition by music for dancing and marching, and that therefore dance music played a very important part in the history of music. He contended that the hypothesis that the earliest dance music was merely song music was not justified by facts. Many of the earliest songs were of a languishing character, and, on the other hand, much of the earliest dance music eminently unvocal. A number of illustrations from all national schools were performed to illustrate this position. Resuming, the Professor remarked, that for the preservation of these old dance tunes we were mainly indebted to the habit, otherwise to be deplored, of church composers employing them as subjects in their compositions, in which the airs, and sometimes even the words, of such secular melodies were assigned to one of the parts. The lecturer concluded by tracing the growth of the minuet form in overtures, sonatas, and symphonies. The illustrations comprised specimens of dance music from the year 1300 to the present day, and were admirably rendered by Mr Parratt, B. Mus., and a string band.

RETFORD.—The members of the Retford Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season on Tuesday night, the 6th ult., in the Town Hall, before a large audience. The first part consisted mainly of The Walpurgis-Night (Mendelssohn). The Overture was given with fine effect by Miss Hammond, Mr. Hamilton White, and Mr. F. Wells.

The Druid solo (tenor), "Now May again breaks winter's chain," was well sung by Mr. Spence. The remaining solos of the work were entrusted to Miss Cross, Mr. Denman, Mr. Brameld, and Mr. Pidd, and the several parts were rendered in a manner which elicited the hearty applause of the audience. The choruses were taken up promptly and with highly dramatic effect throughout. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss Jenkinson, Miss Cross, Miss Postlethwaite, Miss Marshall, Mr. Bradshaw, and Mr. Musgrave contributed songs, and Mr. Hamilton White conducted.

ROCHESTER.—An exceedingly good performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given by the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society in the New Corn Exchange, on April 28, too late for notice in our last issue. Rochester has some reason to be gratified at the continued successes achieved by its Choral Society, which is really a very well-balanced and intelligent body of amateurs, numbering over 200 members. Much care had evidently been bestowed on the rehearsals by the painstaking and enthusiastic conductor, Rev. W. H. Nutter, and the result was on the whole a highly creditable performance of a work which is by many considered to be Mendelssohn's masterpiece. Especially worthy of note was the rendering of the stirring chorus, "Stone him to death," which was sung with energy and precision, and the chorus, "Happy and blest are they," given with much expression. The choral "Sleepers, wake," although possibly the most familiar of all the choral portion, was a little less effectively rendered. Mrs. Osgood, whose artistic singing especially fits her for Oratorio music, sang throughout with taste and expression, especially in the beautiful air "Jerusalem." Miss Orridge's fine voice was heard to advantage in the air, "But the Lord is mindful," which the audience would gladly have heard repeated, but that encores appear to be wisely forbidden at these performances. Mr. Barton McGuckin sang the arduous tenor music with much skill, his happiest effort being "Be thou faithful unto death" (violoncello obbligato, Mr. Norman), which was warmly applauded. Mr. Thurley Beale, who was suffering from a severe cold, sang nevertheless with much power, his rendering of the air, "Consume them all," being specially commendable. It was to be regretted that the duet for the false witnesses, properly assigned to two bass voices, should have been sung as a semi-chorus. This arrangement was no doubt a matter of expediency, but the result was not satisfactory. Such alterations of an author's intentions are always dangerous, and although, from a dramatic point of view, it may be perfectly justifiable to sing the celebrated duet in Israel in Egypt as if given by all the Hebrew warriors, in the instance now referred to there is no legitimate motive for making a somewhat similar alteration. The choir was supplemented by an orchestra of about seventy performers, selected principally from the military bands in the vicinity, and efficiently led by Mr. C. Fletcher. An occasional want of unanimity was however apparent, arising probably from insufficient rehearsal. The performance was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Nutter with much care. The New Corn Exchange, a very handsome building, and admirably adapted for the purpose, was filled by a large and fashionable, although singularly undemonstrative, audience. A full rehearsal of the work was given, according to custom, on the previous Saturday evening, when the solo parts were sung by Miss Arthur, Miss Daiman, Mr. C. Beckett, and Mr. W. Webster, jun.

ROSS.—A very successful Concert was given at the Corn Exchange on Tuesday, the 6th ult., by the Vocal Union, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Charlesworth, and a full band. Mr. L. S. C. Moss conducted. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and a miscellaneous selection. The solos in the Hymn of Praise were taken by Miss Nash and Miss Seymour, one of the best items in the performance being the duet and chorus "I waited for the Lord." The choruses were given capitally, the voices being evenly balanced and the result most effective. The accompaniments to the songs were played by Miss Moss.

SELKIRK.—The seventh season of the Selkirk Choral Union was brought to a close on Thursday, April 24, by a successful Concert given in the Volunteer Hall. The chorus consisted of from forty to fifty members of the Union, which also furnished most of the soloists, Miss Simpson (Edinburgh) taking the soprano parts. Mr. Thornton, Organist of St. Peter's, Galashiels, conducted, and Mr. Horrox, Organist, Ladhope, accompanied on the harmonium, a lady member of the Union presiding at the piano. The first part of the concert consisted of Haydn's Spring, the second of a selection of part-songs, choruses, and solos, vocal and instrumental. The soloists were highly satisfactory, and the singing of the choir indicated a real advance in accuracy of rendering and careful attention to expression.

SHEPTON MALLET.—On Tuesday, the 13th ult., an evening Concert was given at the Music Hall by Madame Lily Lowe, assisted by Mr. J. N. Hemsley (alto), Messrs. Taylor and Gawthrop (tenors), and Mr. R. Mills (bass), all of whom gave the utmost satisfaction. Madame Lily Lowe was highly successful in her songs, particularly in "Robert, toi que j'aime." Several part songs, and Mendelssohn's Hear my prayer were beautifully given during the evening.

SIDCUP.—The members of the Sidcup Choral Society, under the direction of their Conductor, Mr. W. H. Gill, gave the last Concert of the season on the 23rd ult. The first part consisted of a selection from The Messiah, in which the choir greatly distinguished itself, more particularly in the choruses, "Lift up your heads" and "Hallelujah." The solos were taken by Miss Muriel Wood, Miss Kate Leipold, Mr. H. E. Ward, and Mr. Doyle. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and the harmonium by Miss A. Kerr, Mrs. Shallis, Miss A. Gill, and Mr. Horace Buttery. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of songs and glees, and a pianoforte trio by the Misses Bennett and Miss Tolhurst, which was redemanded.

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their only Concert this season on Tuesday evening, April 29, in the Town Hall, when Mendelssohn's St. Paul was performed. Dr. Heap was the Conductor. The solos were undertaken by Miss Carina Clelland, Mrs. T. Taylor, Mr. Welch, of Durham Cathedral, and Mr. Lander. The orchestra consisted of performers from Birmingham, with the addition of Mr. F. Mountford and Mr. R. Hordley, members of the Society.

SURBITON.—A Concert was given by Mr. Hart, on Monday the 12th ult., in the Christ Church Schools. The programme was well selected, and Haydn's Symphony in D was rendered by the Surbiton Orchestral Society in excellent style. The solo vocalists were Miss Greiffenhagen, Madame Poole, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Mr. Sebastian Hart was the accompanist throughout the evening, and gave some special piano performances, which merit the highest commendation.

TORONTO.—At the second Concert given by the members of the Philharmonic Society, in Shaftesbury Hall, Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed in a highly creditable manner. The solo parts were sung by Mrs. Bradley, Miss Reed, Miss McCallum, Miss Corlett, Mrs. Morrison, Miss Scott, Messrs. Mockridge, Boeckh, Macdougall, and Warrington. Among the numbers particularly worthy of notice were —"Hear ye Israel," Mrs. Bradley; "It is enough," Mr. Warrington; the Baal choruses, and the choruses "Be not afraid," and "Thanks be to God;" the trio, "Lift thine eyes," was also deserving of high commendation. Mr. Torrington conducted.

TRING.—The Harmonic Society gave its third and last Concert of the second season on Thursday the 24th ult. when Handel's Messiah was performed. The soloists, mostly amateurs and members of the Society, were Miss Rose (of Chesham) and Miss Edmonds (sopranos), Miss Glover and Miss Martyr (contraltos), Messrs. Bowles, Carr, and Hobson (tenors), and Signor Brocolini (bass). Mr. Theodore Drew, Organist of Holy Trinity, Brompton, ably presided at the pianoforte and harmonium. Mr. Hobson, Organist of Trinity Church, officiated as Conductor, and much credit is due to him for his exertions in bringing this young Society to such perfection.

TROWBRIDGE.—A Concert, attended with the most satisfactory results, was given on Tuesday, April 29, by the members of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society (twenty-six in number) in aid of the funds of the Trowbridge Cottage Hospital. Mr. G. Riseley, Organist of Bristol Cathedral, conducted. The whole of the local arrangements were undertaken by Mr. H. Millington.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—A morning Concert was given in the Great Hall on April 30 by Mr. Nelson Irons, which proved a great success. The vocalists were Miss Glenn, who possesses a fine contralto voice, and was highly appreciated in the Canzonetta from Dinorah, "Fanciulle chè il core," and "The Better Land" (Cowen); Miss Adela Vernon, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Signor G. Olmi. Miss Cecile Brousil played De Beriot's Concerto, No. 9, for violin, and Mr. Irons, who presided at the pianoforte, gave Chopin's Polonaise in C, and, by request, his own graceful Impromptu Mazurka.

WANTAGE.—Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus, followed by a miscellaneous selection, was given at a Concert in the Corn Exchange on April 29 by the Parish Church Choir, under the conductorship of the Precentor, the Rev. H. H. Woodward, Mus. Bac., who may be congratulated on possessing such a fine choir, all the leads in the choruses being taken up with wonderful precision and firmness. Miss Beata Francis sang the soprano recitatives, &c., in a finished style, and displayed a voice of great purity and clearness. The solos for tenor and bass were carefully rendered by the Rev. W. Neville and the Rev. T. H. Houblon. Dr. Stainer's Cantata is so rapidly finding its way to the hearts of the musical world that its many points of beauty and excellence need not here be dwelt upon. The second part consisted of three numbers from St. Paul, two from Elijah, and three from The Creation; in addition to these, Spohr's "As pants the hart," and a Quartett and Chorus, "The souls of the righteous," written by the Conductor, were given. The latter composition was vociferously encored, the singing of the Quartett by Miss Francis, Mrs. Monnington, and the two gentlemen already named, being a model for balance of quality and perfection of intonation. The band, led by Mr. Liddle, of Windsor, was generally good. A fine rendering, both by chorus and band, of "The heavens are telling," brought the concert to a close. The Exchange was filled with a crowded and attentive audience.

WILLESDEN.—The new Organ, erected by Messrs. Morten and Taylor, for the Presbyterian Church, was opened on Wednesday, the 21st ult., by Mr. Llewellyn Winter, Mus. Bac., assisted vocally by Madame Francis Brooke and Mr. F. Wood. The Organ has been fitted up in a luxurious manner, and has an imposing frontage of over 16 feet wide. The tone of the instrument was much admired.

WINDSOR.—The second Concert of the season, in connection with the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, took place on Tuesday the 6th ult., in the Town Hall. The work performed was Sir Michael Costa's Eli, which was given here for the first time. Miss Amy Aylward (soprano), Mr. T. Hunt (tenor), and Mr. W. T. Briggs (bass), were the principal soloists. The air, "I will extol Thee," by Miss Aylward, was especially effective, and the quartett, "We bless you," was very finely rendered, and elicited loud applause. All the choruses were sustained with vigour and executed with more than average merit. The orchestra was small but exceedingly efficient. Mr. J. S. Liddle led the band, and Mr. S. Smith conducted. There was a very good attendance. ——A Concert was given by the members of the Windsor and Eton Madrigal Society, in St. Mark's School-room, on Tuesday the 20th ult. There was a large audience, including H.R.H. the Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. The first part of the Concert consisted of Gounod's Messe Solennelle, the solos being taken by the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley, Mr. T. Hunt (tenor), and the Rev. R. Tahourdin (bass). The second part consisted of choruses and part-music, all sacred, amongst which was Mendelssohn's "O come let us worship." The performance throughout was excellent.

WORTHING.—The members of the Sacred Harmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Haydn's Creation, in Montague Hall, on the 7th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Scorey, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Bridson. There was a good orchestra, led by Herr Pollitzer, and Mr. L. S. Palmer conducted as usual.

YEOVIL.—Two performances of The Messiah were given by the Yeovil Choral Society, at special services held at St. John's Church on the 7th and 8th ult. The chorus numbered about seventy voices. Mr. Joseph Whitby presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, of Cheltenham, Mrs. Steadman, of Weymouth, Mr. R. Mills, Vicar Choral of Wells Cathedral, and Mr. A. Price, of Yeovil. The choruses were given with much judgment and precision, reflecting great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Harry A. Bullock, Organist of St. John's.

YORK.—At the opening of the Yorkshire Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition by the Archbishop of York, on the 7th ult., the York Choral Society, conducted by Mr. R. S. Burton, of Leeds, sang "Let all men praise the Lord" and "Ye nations offer to the Lord" from Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, and "Hallelujah to the Father," from Beethoven's Mount of Olives. Mr. George Hirst, of Leeds, presided at the organ. On the 16th ult., Herr Padel gave a Pianoforte Recital on two of Messrs. Pohlmann and Son's instruments. The programme included selections from Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words;" F. Liszt's "Cujus animam," "Rêve de Bonheur" (Wollenhaupt), Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata; Saltarello (Heller); "Gondola Song" (F. Benal); Chopin's Polonaise, A flat, Op. 53; Minuette and Moto continué," from Weber's First Sonata. The finished manner in which the various pieces were performed, elicited frequent applause. In the evening, Mr. Strickland, of the Blind School, gave an Organ Recital, the programme being selected from the works of Handel and Mozart.

"It is not often that pieces of such sterling originality are issued from the press for the benefit of organ-players as these six pieces by E. Silas. There is not one that can be counted a weak piece; all are good, and all bear traces of the hand of a workman cunning in his craft, who brings his whole soul and every energy to bear upon his labours. They are written—as music for the organ should be written—with a separate part for the pedals, and full directions as to the nature and character of the stops to be employed. There are none which can be said to possess insuperable difficulties for the tolerably advanced player; all are effective, and would prove a boon both to the solo performer and for ordinary purposes; and in the belief that they will be found useful, and tend to increase the reputation of the composer, we recommend them with every confidence."—Musical Record.

"The talent of Mr. Edouard Silas as a composer is too widely recognised to render any preliminary eulogium of his merits advisable in approaching the discussion of these welcome additions to the narrow repertory of genuine organ music. No. 1 on our list has a plaintive flowing subject, very expressively harmonised. There is an alternative section in the tonic major consisting of a song-like theme, with accompaniment in quiet arpeggios. Then the first subject returns differently harmonised, and the piece comes to an effective close. The March is an elaborate composition. The first theme savours of commonplace, though a sudden change from dominant to sub-dominant harmony has a striking effect. The first trio in the relative minor is sad in character, and it contains some further remarkable transitions. After the usual return of the principal subject there is a second trio in the tonic minor. This is somewhat in the style of a choral, with a moving pedal bass. Fresh matter of an agitated nature is then introduced, but the first theme at length returns, and then a brief coda brings the March to a conclusion.—No. 3 commences with a pleasing motive, which is carried on for twenty-six bars. Then a fugue is started, and continued for four pages, after which the first portion is repeated in a slightly varied form.—The Pastorale opens simply, the first portion being constructed on a tonic and dominant pedal alternately. The key then changes to the minor, and there follows a good deal of imitative writing, eventually leading to a half-close on the dominant. The conclusion is more energetic, and the pastoral manner is certainly not maintained throughout.—As may be supposed from its title, No. 5 is eminently ecclesiastical in style. It opens with a solemn adagio, and the writing for some time is purely contrapuntal, though modern in spirit. Towards the end it works up to a fortissimo, and the piece ends with some pompous chords.—The Elegy has a few bars of introduction in unison lento, and then a theme is given out and treated as a duet. After a close on the tonic, the key changes to G flat, and the next portion is church-like, with curious harmonies. The duet then returns in extenso, and is followed by a more jubilant subject in the tonic major. The next section is very bright and vigorous, but it does not come to a full close, and the sombre vein returns, the piece ending in the quietest manner. We can cordially recommend these compositions to the notice of organists. Without being demonstrative or vulgar, they are pleasantly unconventional, and are free from the heaviness of the German school, the frivolity of the French, and the weakness of the English. Nos. 1, 2, and 6 will especially repay attention."—Music Trades Review.

THE CONGREGATIONAL PSALMIST.

Edited by HENRY ALLON, D.D., and H. J. GAUNTLETT, Mus. Doc.

Providing Tunes, Chants, and Anthems, by the best Composers, Ancient and Modern. List of editions on application.

CHURCH ANTHEMS, &c. Edited by HENRY ALLON, D.D. Containing One Hundred and Fifteen Anthems for Congregational Use. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s.; crown 8vo, roan, 3s. 6d.; Cheap Edition, limp cloth, 1s. 4d.; stiff cloth, 1s. 8d.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorales and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

THE HIGHEST HONOUR, PARIS, 1878; THE CROSS OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR; THE GOLD MEDAL (L'ACADÉMIE NATIONALE); AND ALSO THE SILVER MEDAL; THE GOLD MEDAL AND DIPLOMA OF HONOUR, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877; THE MEDAL OF HONOUR AND DIPLOMA OF MERIT, PHILADELPHIA, 1876; THE GRAND DIPLOMA OF HONOUR, PARIS, 1874; THE GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1869; THE DIPLOMA OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT, AMSTERDAM, 1869; MEDAL OF HONOUR, PARIS, 1867; PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862; &c., &c., HAVE BEEN AWARDED TO

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875 & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE." "A. FETIS,

"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI,

"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal frame-work used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

BY WM. POLE, F.R.S., MUS. DOC.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION IN GERMAN SCHOOLS.

By Dr. W. Langhans (of Berlin).

"A schoolmaster must be able to sing, or I will not look at him." Such are the words of Martin Luther which, together with many another pithy saying of the reformer respecting the necessity of a musical education for the young, has not been spoken unheeded by his own country. It is true that the present age, with its one-sided bias in favour of the development of the purely mental faculties, has little in common with the enthusiasm with which musical art was cultivated in German schools during the sixteenth century, when a Johann Walther (then capellmeister of Frederic the Wise, and musical coadjutor of Luther in his reform of congregational singing) was enjoined, according to the provisions of the Sächsische Schulordnung, "to devote three hours to musical instruction weekly, as well as two hours to the practice of singing." "Besides which," continues the document referred to, "he shall give instruction three times a week, at his own house, to the singers employed in the choir, and finally, during the weeks preceding Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, he shall practise singing with the boys in the school daily at the hour of noon." Compared with this, the musical instruction included in our modern school-system, amounting as it does to no more than two or, at the most, three lessons during the week, occupies a somewhat subordinate position, and more especially in the higher-class public schools, where purely mental training is gaining from year to year greater predominance. But even there the results obtained by the existing musical instruction bear sufficient evidence of an intelligent appreciation of the art, both on the part of the pupils and their teachers. As an example of this may be quoted the well-known Gymnasium "zum grauen Kloster" at Berlin, an institution which in its scientific activity need not shun comparison with any other German grammar-school, and which at the same time assigns a prominent place to the conscientious cultivation of music. Here, more effectively than in any other of the fourteen similar educational establishments of the capital, the ultimate object of vocal instruction is kept in view, viz., to kindle among all the pupils a sense of appreciation of good, serious music, and to develop as far as possible their susceptibilities of the idiomatic, rhythmical, and harmonic relations of vocal compositions. This desired end is sought to be obtained by theoretical instruction and the practising of standard vocal pieces by both old and new masters; and the high aims in this direction of the institution in question, and the noble results which it has already achieved under the zealous guidance of its musical instructor, Professor Heinrich Bellermann, will be sufficiently apparent from the following extract taken from the Annual Report of the Gymnasium.

In the lowest form (Sexta) the rudiments of harmonic and rhythmical proportions are taught in conjunction with musical notation, while scales, solfeggios, chorals, and easy songs (Volkslieder) are practised in unison and their structure explained, the entire class either singing together at a convenient pitch, or the altos and sopranos alternately. In the next form (Unter-Quinta) the pupils are specially divided into sopranos and altos, with whom chorals, songs, motetts, psalms, &c., by different masters (such as Palestrina, Graun, Marcello) are practised unisono in each division separately. In the two second singing classes proper, easy two-part songs, chorals and motetts are introduced, whereas in the first or choral class compositions for four, five, six, and eight voices by masters of the sixteenth and following centuries are being practised a capella, besides other works written with orchestral accompaniments, especially the choruses from Handel's oratorios, which never fail to exercise a stimulating influence upon the pupils. But the principal portion of our time remains devoted to a capella singing, so that every singing lesson in which the full chorus is assembled is at least commenced by a four or five-part choral or a motett written in the severer style. The only instruction book in use is Bellermann's "Anfangsgründe der Musik für den ersten Singunterricht auf Gymnasien und Realschulen" (seventh edition), which is intended for the younger pupils only as a brief guide in their study of the elementary part of the art, and which contains moreover a number of simple solfeggios and hymn-tunes. The music in use at the Gymnasium is either printed or copied out in separate vocal parts, it not being considered advisable to adopt the compressed score, or rather pianoforte arrangements given in nearly all the collections of songs and chorals published expressly for school purposes, and by which the clear perception of the melody to be sung by him is unnecessarily rendered more difficult to the pupil.

But neither the excellent method alone, nor the ability of the teachers (Professor Bellermann being assisted in the vocal instruction by another of the staff of masters, Dr. Müller), nor the seventeen hours of teaching during the week, can sufficiently explain the extraordinary success attending the vocal study at the Gymnasium "zum grauen Kloster;" its ultimate reason must be looked for rather in the older artistic traditions associated with this institution, which exercise a direct influence upon all connected with it, including even those who have no immediate sympathy with the cause. For it cannot, unfortunately, be denied that the majority of leading pedagogues in this country, trained as they are in the dominant utilitarian principles of the age, occupy an indifferent and even hostile position with regard to art-instruction in schools, to the development of which many obstacles are, as a matter of fact, though not avowedly, presented on their part. It is owing to this opposition that, with the exception of the institution referred to, scarcely one of the Berlin State grammar-schools may be said to produce such satisfactory results, vocally, as the ability and zeal of the respective teachers—without exception professional musicians of eminence—would entitle us to expect. On the other hand, a better chance of success is offered wherever the singing-master also takes part in other branches of instruction which are considered more important by the ruling caste of philologians, a combination which is, however, met with in smaller towns only where there is a want of able resident professors. Thus at Torgau, a town of some 10,000 inhabitants, Dr. Otto Taubert, professor of ancient languages, and at the same time vocal instructor of the local Gymnasium, has succeeded in forming a choir among his pupils scarcely inferior to that of the "graue Kloster" of Berlin, and the occasional special performances of which invariably attract a numerous audience, including visitors from the larger neighbouring towns. It is owing to the exertions of this in many ways gifted teacher that the ancient musical glory of Torgau has gained fresh lustre in our day; for it was here where the spirit of Protestantism found its earliest musical expression in the founding of the first municipal "Cantorei-Gesellschaft" (1530), and where, a hundred years later (1627), the then novel art-form but lately discovered in Italy—viz., modern Opera—was first introduced upon German ground by the production at the Court of the Elector, Johann Georg I., of the Opera "Daphne," fashioned after the Italian model, with the text written by Opitz and the music by Schütz.

The present flourishing condition of singing at the Torgau Gymnasium proves at least this, that the two-fold capacity of a teacher placed as it were between art and science, anomalous though such a position be in this age of specialism, is nevertheless not without its distinct advantages, inasmuch as it invests the singing-master at a school with an authority which, but for his double voice in the council of professors, he would not otherwise possess, and which enables him to resist the elements adverse to his cause existing among the general teaching body. And this leads us to the middle and lower class schools, the "Real" and "Volksschulen," of which the former in some cases, particularly in the larger towns, possess a specially appointed singing-master, while the latter have to shift without. If nevertheless the condition of school-singing is comparatively and on the whole more satisfactory in these than in the higher-class establishments, the reason must be sought for in the fact that the State, which regards art-instruction at the Gymnasia with perfect unconcern, exercises a direct influence upon vocal development in the Volksschule by exacting a certain degree of musical capacity on the part of its teachers as a condition of their appointment. All teachers of elementary schools (Volksschulen) emanate, it should be added, from Government training colleges or seminaries in which music is taught as an obligatory branch of instruction, embracing not singing only, but also pianoforte, organ, and violin playing, as well as theoretical instruction, comprising harmony, simple counterpoint, and the elements of composition. Not that the future teacher of the Volksschule is expected to impart all his musical knowledge to his pupils; these are merely taught to sing; and as regards the theory of the art it is considered sufficient to make them acquainted with the notes, the intervals, and the rhythmical division. But the musical proficiency obtained in the seminary will not fail to prove of considerable service to the elementary teacher in another direction. A certain familiarity with pianoforte and organ enables him to combine, in the smallest places or in villages, the office of organist with that of schoolmaster. His violin, on the other hand, is of the utmost importance to him in his singing lessons where the aid of some instrument is indispensable, while in most instances it is difficult to procure a pianoforte—to say nothing of the additional advantage over the latter instrument possessed by the violin in its capacity to produce absolutely true musical intervals, which the mechanism of the keyed instrument is incapable of, and the playing of which, moreover, necessitates the teacher's remaining in one place during the lesson, while with violin in hand he is able to move about the school-room and thus more easily to maintain discipline among the pupils. Taking into consideration, together with the above facts, the circumstance that the obligatory attendance at singing lessons, prescribed by the State on principle for all schools alike, is far more rigorously enforced in the Volksschule than in the Gymnasium; and we need not be surprised if, as already stated, the results of the teaching are on the whole more satisfactory at the former branches of our system than at the latter. It should not be overlooked, however, that it is also far more practicable to insist upon the vocal instruction of all pupils in the Volksschule, seeing that compulsory education is only extended to the completion of the age of fourteen, i.e., before the period of the mutation of the voice has commenced, which in the case of the scholars at the Gymnasium causes frequent interruptions of vocal study. Thus in the humblest village-school songs for two voices may constantly be heard, while not unfrequently also three and four-part Lieder will be correctly rendered by the children. In this respect Berlin again takes the lead, where in 105 schools more than 80,000 children are being instructed at the expense of Government. Respecting the musical influence of these schools a striking exhibition was presented last year to the public of the capital on the occasion of the inauguration of the hundredth local elementary school. Among the festive proceedings in connection with the event was included a musical performance instituted and conducted by Rector Th. Krause, one of the few pedagogues who have to the fullest extent acted upon the maxim laid down by Martin Luther which we have placed at the commencement of this article. The performance referred to consisted of the rendering, on the part of 1,200 pupils and 300 of their teachers, of a psalm composed by the conductor and executed with the utmost purity and precision. The occurrence has attracted public attention to the great merit of Rector Krause, whose exceptional capacity as a musical pedagogue is moreover well-known, and the desire is very generally expressed that he should be raised from his position as director of the leading Volksschule of Berlin to an office which would afford adequate scope for the exercise of his eminent talents.

Such an office, however, would have to be specially created, since it does not yet, unfortunately, exist in Germany, namely, that of a "General Inspector of School-Singing." A certain control is indeed exercised by the Government over musical instruction in public schools, in the first place by the School Council (Schulrath), among the members of which one at least invariably possesses a sound musical knowledge, and, in the next instance, by the musical instructors of the training colleges who have passed the State examination, and upon whom also devolves the duty of periodically visiting their respective provinces for the purpose of inquiry into the condition of school-singing and reporting thereon to the Government. The latter, moreover, possesses an additional guarantee for the proper carrying out of the existing regulations in favour of vocal instruction at schools in the so-called "Institut für Kirchenmusik." This institution, founded in the year 1822, and connected with the Royal Academy of Arts, has for its object to convey such additional musical instruction to organists, cantors, and other professional musicians, as would enable them to take positions at the higher educational establishments of the country, special preference being given to pupils at the seminaries who have shown manifest talent for the art, and to whom an opportunity is thereby afforded for its more extensive cultivation. Thus the tendency of the institution in question is one of almost ideal excellence; but the sphere of its activity is unfortunately limited to insignificant proportions as long as the subsidy derived by it from the State amounts, as it actually does, to no more than about 9,600 marks (not quite £500), the professors giving their services gratis. In spite, however, of its pecuniary restrictions, upwards of ninety cantors and organists have during the past ten years reaped the benefits offered by the institution; and the great merits of its zealous director, Professor Haupt, have met with at least an indirect recognition on the part of the Conservatoires of Vienna and Prague, who, in the reorganisation of their respective organ-schools, have adopted the institution conducted by him as a model. Considering, then, that the above-mentioned insignificant sum, together with the moderate salaries paid to the musical teachers at the Government seminaries (2,400 to 3,000 marks, besides free residence, their number being 121), make up the sum total of the direct State grants for the purpose of vocal instruction at schools, it seems not unreasonable to anticipate a further extension of Government subsidies for the appointment of well-paid inspectors of this branch of national education, whose first duty it would be to remove the manifold defects in the prevailing system, with which the existing supervision has proved itself unable to cope, and to prepare the way for the adoption of a universal method of vocal teaching in German schools (so constantly insisted upon at the periodical meetings of the General Association of German Musicians), which would serve as guidance alike to the teachers of the Volksschule and to the directors of the military choirs established throughout the entire German army. This question, though not as yet taken up by the State, has at least advanced a step nearer to its solution by the recent publication of a work entitled "Tafeln für den Schulgesang-Unterricht" (Tables for Vocal Instruction at Schools), by the Berlin organist, Hermann Hauer, the excellence of which for practical purposes may be inferred from the fact that it has already been introduced into 400 schools. Nor have the members of the General Association of German Musicians, nothing daunted by the all but indifferent attitude of the Government, been remiss of late in their zealous advocacy of the cause of reform of school-singing; and it is only a few weeks ago that a pamphlet was issued, at the expense of the Association, from the pen of Albert Tottmann (the leader of the reformatory movement in this direction in Saxony), pointing out in an able and eloquent manner the importance of this branch of popular instruction in its hygienic, psychological, and ethical aspects. The suggestions contained in this pamphlet demand the greater attention, since they are the result, not of abstract theoretical speculation, but of an extensive practical experience, the author having been for years the highly successful vocal professor at one of the leading girls' schools of Leipzig, the periodical musical performances of which bear witness to his great ability as a teacher of singing. His example, in fact, as well as the no less successful activity of Musik-director Alexis Holländer, of the Victoria Girls' School at Berlin, furnish moreover sufficient evidence of the capacity of female youth, provided it be ably instructed, to vie with the male in the production of valuable artistic results.

The Southern States of the Empire, though more productive in musical talent than the North, have as yet remained considerably behind the latter in matters of organisation and general practical results as regards vocal instruction in schools. Much activity has, however, been displayed of late years, especially in Bavaria, with a view to a general reform of school-singing. In this respect valuable service has been rendered by F. Grell, of Munich, whose admirable collection of Volkslieder was introduced some nine years ago into all Bavarian Government schools. At Munich, obligatory vocal instruction at the elementary schools has only been adopted since 1869. Before that period, however, there existed at every school a so-called "central singing-class," which all the pupils were enabled to join upon a small extra payment. Although obligatory singing lessons have now rendered the majority of these institutions superfluous, there still exists at Munich a "Central-Singschule," founded more than fifty years ago, where children from all parts of the town may receive vocal training. At the annual public examinations of this establishment choral compositions for four and more voices by the best masters are sung (with the assistance of the choristers from the Opera for the tenor and bass parts), and the general excellence of the performances furnish unmistakable evidence of the earnestness and zeal with which the vocal study is conducted. Similar results are to be expected of the Bavarian elementary schools, where Grell's method of teaching, already adopted in principle by the Government, is gradually becoming more generally introduced. This method has much in common with that of the vocal instructor of the Berlin Gymnasium, "zum grauen Kloster," H. Bellermann, of whom mention has already been made. Grell's system insists upon combining instruction in speaking with the singing lesson during the first years of study. The healthy development of the vocal organs being moreover essential for the successful cultivation of the oratorical faculties, singing is to be taught as an art, i.e., according to scientific principles, particularly as regards the formation of the voice, the pronunciation of the vowels and consonants, &c.; and this cannot fail to prove, in its turn, a most valuable aid to the pupil in his reading lessons, while facilitating also his study of orthography. Not till after the third or fourth school-year is the pupil allowed to sing from notes, the subsequent course of musical instruction being dependent upon the number of lessons placed at the disposal of the teacher during the week; but, according to Grell's opinion, vocal instruction at the elementary schools should be confined to two-part or at the most three-part singing. A vocal instruction-book from the pen of this excellent musical professor, and wherein his method is more fully expounded, will be published during the present year.

The foregoing observations may suffice to complete our sketch of the condition of musical or more especially vocal instruction in German schools. That the existing organisation is, on the whole, a satisfactory one will scarcely be denied. But this well-developed organism lacks as yet a central motive power, and will continue to do so as long as the State fails to recognise the perfect equality of music with purely mental culture as a means of education—above all at the Gymnasia or State grammar-schools, from whence a newly awakened art-appreciation would naturally spread to the elementary schools also. If, therefore, the authorities can be brought to perceive the necessity of elevating the musical faculty at State establishments to the position indicated, or of the preliminary introduction at least of a universal system of vocal teaching under the supervision of able, professionally trained inspectors, Germany will doubtless continue to maintain the great reputation in matters musical which she enjoys outside her boundaries. If not, our neighbours will anticipate us in the adoption of these essential national measures, and will ere long have superseded us in the matter of school-singing. For every nation represents in itself the general type of humanity, upon which—apart, of course, from individual distinctions—the Creator has bestowed his gifts with an impartial hand. And if by chance one of the civilising nations has remained behind in the development of this or that element of human culture, the reason must be sought for, not indeed in the want of natural ability, but rather in unfavourable outward circumstances. All that is needed, then, is the determination to remove these obstacles and to choose the proper remedies, and it will follow as a matter of course that what has hitherto been neglected will speedily grow into healthy existence; and the results thus obtained will not compare unfavourably with the best achievements of any other nation.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE CLAVICHORD WITH HISTORICAL NOTICES.

By Carl Engel.

The clavichord has been for centuries so very popular in Germany and other European countries, and our classical composers have written for this instrument music so very beautiful that I venture to presume a description of the clavichords which are in my possession will interest musical antiquarians. I need scarcely remind them that Johann Sebastian Bach wrote for the clavichord his immortal forty-eight Preludes and Fugues, called by him "Das wohltemperirte Klavier," besides numerous Allemandes, Gavottes, Gigues, and such like quaint and sprightly conceptions. This fact alone would suffice to render an acquaintance with the instrument desirable to every intelligent musician. He is sure to find it interesting and instructive to ascertain the characteristics and capabilities of an instrument for which the compositions which have become familiar to him by means of the pianoforte were originally intended.

In fact, the clavichord was until the present century a favourite instrument with musical composers. Haydn and Mozart wrote some of their earlier works, now known as pianoforte compositions, originally for the clavichord; and even Beethoven is recorded to have preferred this instrument in his youth to the pianoforte, on account of its delicate touch and expression.

Its high antiquity, embracing about eight centuries, and the circumstance of its being the oldest stringed instrument provided with a keyboard, would alone suffice to render the clavichord particularly interesting to the lover of music. The harpsichord cannot claim so high an age; and this is not surprising, if we compare its complicated mechanism with that of the clavichord. Now both, once so much admired, have become obsolete. The late Mr. Kirkman told me that he, with his father, constructed the last harpsichord in the year 1809. Clavichords were still occasionally made in Germany about the year 1820, and even later.

With these remarks I have indicated the reason which induced me to rescue four old clavichords from impending destruction, and to have them restored to a playable condition. I obtained them from Germany, a country where a specimen of the old stamp is still occasionally to be met with among the outworn lumber of a country house. However, it is generally in so dilapidated a condition as to defy any attempt at proper restoration. Especially the more primitive kind, called in German Das gebundene Klavier, of which presently some account will be given, has become extremely scarce. The specimen which is in my possession is the only one which has come to my knowledge, although I have lost no opportunity to search for old clavichords of this peculiar construction.

Some centuries ago the clavichord was also known in England. In the Inventory of King Henry VIII.'s musical instruments, which is preserved in the British Museum, we are informed that he had "two paier of clavicordes;" and still earlier, about the year 1500, we find mention made of "clavycordes" belonging to Henry VII. However, the instrument does not appear to have been anything like so popular in England as it was on the Continent. Perhaps this may be accounted for by the softness of its sound. The English people are said to have always preferred rather loud music. It would be interesting to ascertain how far this assertion is well founded; and, if the predilection really exists, how far it results from the climate. There are certainly many persons hard of hearing in England, and it is no uncommon occurrence to meet with Englishmen who, scarcely above fifty years old, complain of being afflicted with partial deafness. The circumstance that many Englishmen speak in an undertone does not confute the opinion that they give a preference to loudness in music, since it may be observed that half-deaf persons generally speak in an undertone, but must be spoken to with a penetrating voice.

Be this as it may, the clavichord has evidently fallen so entirely into oblivion in England that even the musical savants of this country give an incorrect explanation of its construction. Some curious instances could be cited in proof of this assertion; one, however, will suffice, since it is neither pleasant nor instructive to notice more. In "The History of Modern Music" (London, 1862) we are told (p. 143): "The domestic instruments of the third period [from 1600 to 1750], as of the second [from 1400 to 1600], were the clavicytherium, the clavichord, the virginal, and the spinet—instruments differing in shape and size, in compass and power, but essentially the same in principle, the tone being produced by some kind of plectrum pulling the string out of its place, and setting it in vibration. This class attained perfection in the harpsichord."

Although many of the learned musicians residing in London have recently examined the clavichord which I lent to Messrs. Broadwood for the purpose of affording them an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the real construction of the instrument, there is reason to surmise that to most professors of the art a short explanation of the difference between a clavichord and a harpsichord will be acceptable, provided they take some interest in antiquities of this kind.

The mechanism of the clavichord, which is very simple, is constructed with little pins of brass or iron called tangents, which are perpendicularly affixed to the keys, about six inches distant from their ends in the lowest octave, and only about half an inch distant in the highest octave. The tangents measure about an inch in length, and an eighth of an inch in breadth. The prolongation of the key to which the tangent is affixed was called by the German clavichord makers Palmule (Latin, palmula, from palma, "the hand"). When the key is struck the tangent touches the string from beneath, and causes it to sound. As the tangent is placed so as to touch the string near its end, and as the tangent remains pressed against the string as long as the key is held down, it constitutes a sort of bridge which causes a division of the string whereby two different tones are produced, one being of a pitch considerably higher than the other. In order to silence the high tone, and to obtain a definite and pure sound, the vibrations of the short portion of the string are checked by means of strips of cloth with which the strings are interlaced.

The strings are of thin brass wire. Steel wire has occasionally been substituted for it, especially during the eighteenth century, as it was thought by some manufacturers preferable to brass, because it produces a louder sound.

The clavichords made in the eighteenth century have generally for each tone two strings tuned in unison, to increase the sonorousness and power of sound. The lowest bass strings were sometimes covered with very thin wire.

The shape of the clavichord is oblong square. The lower keys (i.e., those of the C major scale) are usually of ebony, or merely of beechwood stained black; the upper keys are of bone, or of ivory.

From this short description the reader will see that the mechanism of the clavichord is quite different from that of the harpsichord. The latter instrument, like that of its near relation, the spinet, has strings of thin steel and brass wire, which are twanged by means of crowquills affixed to perpendicular slips of wood called jacks. The manufacturers of this contrivance preferred crowquills to any other plectra on account of their extraordinary elasticity and durability. However, in the course of time various attempts were made to substitute for them plectra of metal, whalebone, and other elastic substances. Those made of prepared buffalo leather proved especially suitable. The quality of sound produced by means of leather is fuller and more flute-like than that produced by crowquills; but the latter is more delicate, and represents more exactly the characteristic quality of sound peculiar to the old harpsichord and spinet in use at the time of Handel and Bach.

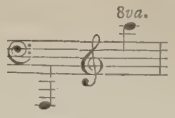
It is not my intention to give a minute description of these instruments, my object being merely to show that their mechanism has nothing in common with that of the clavichord. The spinet (Italian, spinetto) and the harpsichord (Italian, clavicembalo) differ from each other, inasmuch as the former is a smaller and less perfect instrument, generally made in a somewhat triangular shape, not unlike that of the dulcimer, of which ancient instrument the spinet is probably an offspring. The harpsichord may be regarded as an improved spinet. Its shape rather resembles that of a grand piano. It was often provided with two keyboards, and with several registers, or stops, which enabled the player to modify the degree of loudness and the quality of sound. A harpsichord having two keyboards was called in England a double harpsichord. Moreover, the harpsichord differed also from the spinet inasmuch as it had for each tone two strings tuned in unison, while the spinet had only a single string for each tone.

The virginal, which is not unfrequently mentioned in the English literature of the time of Shakespeare, was a spinet generally made of an oblong square shape, and therefore in outward appearance not unlike the clavichord, but in its internal construction entirely different from it, as it had jacks and crowquills. Also a small spinet of a trapezium shape, usually having no stand to rest on, and being placed on a table when required for playing, was sometimes called a virginal, probably because it was intended for young ladies. The statement of some writers that the virginal received its name in compliment to Queen Elizabeth, who was never married, is refuted by the fact that the virginal is mentioned in records dating from a period antecedent to the year of the birth of Queen Elizabeth; for instance, there is a doggerel rhyme about it inscribed on the walls of the Manor House at Leckingfield, Yorkshire, in the time of Henry VII., which may be seen quoted by Rimbault in his book on the history of the pianoforte.

These inquiries are so interesting to musicians of an antiquarian turn of mind that I should like to pursue them further here; however, the superficial sketch which I have given of the harpsichord family will suffice for the aim in view. The characteristics of the clavichord will now become more exactly known to the reader by the following description of the specimens which are in my possession.

CLAVICHORD No. 1.

Obtained from Einbeck, a small town in the vicinity of Hanover. The instrument dates from about the year 1780. Its case is of deal stained brown. Length, 5 feet 8 inches; breadth, 22 inches; compass, 5½ octaves, thus:—



The lower keys are black, and the upper ones white; the former being of ebony, and the latter of bone. Each tone has two strings tuned in unison, and those of the bass tones below—are covered with very thin wire.

It would be interesting to know at what time covered strings were first used on the clavichord. Most likely they date from the first half of the eighteenth century, when some of the manufacturers began to extend the compass in the bass from C to F, as shown in the above notation. Jakob Adlung states, in his "Anleitung zur musikalischen Gelahrtheit" ("A Guide to Musical Erudition"), that he commenced in the year 1732 constructing clavichords which extended in the bass down to—and in the treble as high as—

The lowest twenty keys had covered strings. Furthermore, in his instructive "Musica Mechanica Organoedi," written about the year 1750, he says: "Sometimes the lowest strings of the clavichord are covered with thin silver wire. If the ordinarily used string is thus covered, it requires to be tuned an octave lower; therefore C becomes C. But, if a thinner string is covered, it may be C tuned in the same pitch with an uncovered one of the usual thickness. Generally, two different strings are tuned in unison—viz., an uncovered string and a covered one. But if the bass has three strings for each tone, it is the custom to make use of two covered strings for the unison, and of an uncovered string of thin wire to sound the octave above. The covered strings are generally confined to the lowest tones, upwards to—and they give to the bass a particular dignity. However, any change of the atmosphere is apt to render their unison with the uncovered string out of tune."

As regards the harpsichord, some of the German manufacturers, about the middle of the eighteenth century, made use of covered strings in the bass, as high as thereby achieving, in their opinion, a grand tone; however, the innovation found but little favour, because experiments showed that the quills soon rubbed off the thin wire.

The covering of the strings was remarkably wide, and the same appears to have been the case with the primitive pianoforte. I have in my possession some strings extremely widely covered, which are said to have been formerly used in England on the pianoforte. As regards this instrument, Messrs. Broadwood have informed me that their old square piano, by Zumpe, dated 1766, has the lowest fourteen strings widely covered, or "open-spun," to use the technical term of the manufacturers. As this instrument has two strings in unison for each tone, it follows that the lowest seven tones have covered strings. Again, Messrs. Broadwood possess a square piano, made by them in 1780, in which the lowest ten tones have open-spun strings. But it is impossible to ascertain whether these strings are the original ones, or whether in the course of time others have been substituted.

Jean Rousseau, in his "Traité de la Viole" (Paris, 1687), mentions that Sainte-Colombe was the first French viol-player who made use of covered strings on the viol, and that he introduced them into France about the middle of the seventeenth century. Probably they were invented in Italy; but this appears to be uncertain.

Before dismissing the Clavichord No. 1, I must say a word of praise about its delicate and expressive tone. True, it is rather feeble, even for a clavichord; but it has the peculiar quality which the Germans call silbern (silvery), and one is sure to appreciate the instrument more and more on becoming nearer acquainted with its proper treatment. Be it remembered for once and all, a clavichord must not be treated as if it were a grand piano. Its keys should never be struck very forcibly; modern brilliant pianoforte pieces are not suited for the instrument. Still, there is a wonderful modification of loudness obtainable on the clavichord, merely by the touch of the finger, if the player understands his work. He almost feels the vibration of the strings with the tips of his fingers, as does the violinist on the fingerboard of the violin.

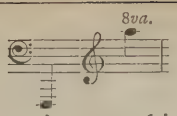
This specimen resembles the preceding one in outward appearance, but its tone is less insinuating. Inscription on the panel over the keyboard: "G. N. Deckert, Gross-Breitenbach bei Arnstadt." The instrument dates probably from about the year 1800. Gross-Breitenbach, where it was made, is a small town in Thuringia not far from Coburg, the birthplace of Prince Albert.

Each tone has two strings; the instrument is therefore what the Germans call zweichörig. As regards the employment of two strings in unison for each tone, there can be no doubt that it was adopted at an early period, probably about four centuries ago, for the purpose of increasing the power of sound. Also the lute was generally strung with unisons to render its sound fuller and louder. Jakob Adlung, who was born towards the end of the seventeenth century, and who in his "Musica Mechanica Organoedi" has given a very exact account of the clavichord of his time, states that he has never met with one which had only a single string for each tone; but that occasionally, and rather unsuccessfully, attempts had been made to construct clavichords with three strings for each tone. Jakob Adlung died in the year 1762, and his book alluded to was published after his death, edited by J. L. Albrecht (Berlin, 1768).

Clavichord No. 3.

Inscribed on the soundboard, near the bridge: "Barthold Fritz fecit, Braunschweig anno 1751, Mens. Febr." The case is painted green, and the inside of its cover contains a picture painted in blue, which represents a hunting scene of men and ladies on horseback, and hounds pursuing a stag which is traversing a river. The lower keys are of ebony, and the upper ones are of ivory. The latter are embellished with a neatly-executed design engraven on them and blackened. The compass of the instrument embraces five octaves and two whole tones, thus:—



Each tone has two strings tuned in unison; and the lower tones, from downwards, have, in addition to the two strings, a third one of very thin wire, tuned an octave higher. The sound is powerful, compared with that of the clavichords previously described; but it is less "silvery," probably because the fragile condition of the soundboard does not permit of the strings being screwed up so as to produce the original pitch. It must be remembered that the pitch in which our musical instruments are tuned has risen considerably since the year 1751; at all events, it would be a risk to tune this clavichord higher than a minor third below the present pitch, as the attempt might cause the destruction of the soundboard.

Barthold Fritz, the maker of this instrument, was a distinguished man in his profession, living in Brunswick, where he died in the year 1766 at the age of seventy. Besides organs, harpsichords, and some pianofortes, he manufactured above five hundred clavichords, not only for Germany, but also for exportation into Russia as far as Archangel. Moreover, he was a skilful mechanician, constructing musical boxes, singing birds, looms for weaving, and a horizontal windmill. The last-named contrivance, which was an invention of his own, especially contributed to his reputation. He is also known as the author of a little book on equal temperament entitled "Anweisung wie man Claviere, Clavecins und Orgeln nach einer mechanischen Art in allen zwölf Tönen gleich rein stimmen könne, dass aus solchen allen sowohl dur als moll wohlklingend zu spielen sei" ("A Guide for Tuning Clavichords, Harpsichords, and Organs, equally pure in all the twelve tones, by a mechanical procedure, so that they can be played with pleasant euphony in all the Major and Minor Keys"). This book, which was published by Breitkopf in Leipzig, in the year 1756, went through three editions, and appeared also at Amsterdam in a Dutch translation.

In examining the clavichord by Barthold Fritz, the musical antiquarian will discover some facts which refute the statements usually met with in publications treating on the history of stringed instruments with a keyboard. The compass of this clavichord is greater than that which was generally adopted on such instruments during the middle of the eighteenth century; and the addition of an octave string to the lower tones, in order to render them more powerful and more distinct, was a rather exceptional contrivance, perhaps originally suggested by the octave-stop of the harpsichord. Howbeit, this clavichord was evidently intended to exhibit an extraordinary piece of workmanship. Hence also the painting in the inside of the cover, which was rarely resorted to in clavichords. Poor German scholars, clergymen, and village schoolmasters could not afford to spend money for the embellishment of their clavichords, but they were almost sure to require one for playing fugues and chorals. A case of common deal stained brown or black was generally considered by them sufficient for their purpose, if only the tone was "silvery" and expressive. Such a plain clavichord was remarkably cheap, on account of the simplicity of its mechanism, as well as on account of the cheapness of the material and labour.

The painting in the present instrument has been found interesting by an eminent artist in London, probably more in regard to its antiquity and oddity than for any particular merit. I am unable to detect its beauties; but I cannot claim any knowledge in this matter. The reader is undoubtedly aware that the English virginal also used not unfrequently to be thus embellished. The South Kensington Museum possesses a virginal of the seventeenth century, made by John Loosemore, which is in shape not unlike a coffin, and which when opened places before the eyes of the player Adam and Eve in Paradise, a sea-fight, and hunters. The old Dutch spinet-makers displayed a more refined taste; they engaged their famous painters to embellish the instruments. The result has been rather unfortunate for musical antiquarians, inasmuch as it has caused the destruction of many old spinets for the purpose of securing the coveted paintings.

It must not be supposed that Barthold Fritz stood alone as an improver of the clavichord during the eighteenth century. Various experiments by other makers are on record, which mostly aimed at rendering the tone of the clavichord more powerful, since its feebleness was regarded by many as its chief defect. Without entering upon an enumeration of the curious means resorted to for this purpose, I must mention the cembal d'amour by Gottfried Silbermann, the famous manufacturer of organs and clavichords, who during the latter years of his life distinguished himself as an improver of the pianoforte, which was then still in its infancy. His cembal d'amour dates from the year 1723—not from 1740, as most writers state. J. Walther mentions it in his Lexicon, which was published in the year 1732; this ought to have been known to them, though they might not have ascertained the fact that a description of the cembal d'amour is to be found in the "Breslauer Sammlungen" of the year 1724.

The instrument may be regarded as a double clavichord. Its strings were twice as long as those of an ordinary clavichord, and the tangent touched the string exactly in the middle, so that two tones of equal pitch were produced, since both divisions of the string vibrated precisely alike. Now, even on the ordinary clavichord the pitch of a tone is raised when the player strikes a key too forcibly, and thereby presses the tangent so strongly under the string as to raise it from its level. On the cembal d'amour this deviation was even greater than on the clavichord, as might indeed be conjectured, since a long string which is touched in the middle is more liable to be thus raised than a shorter one which is touched near its end. In other respects G. Silbermann's cembal d'amour was greatly admired. But he cannot be said to have shown ingenuity in the choice of a name for his invention. The word cembal, or cimbal, was formerly used to designate the dulcimer, and is still the name of this instrument in several European languages. In the course of time it was applied, with a prefix, to the harpsichord, which was called clavicembalo (i.e., "a dulcimer with keys"); but it never meant the clavichord.

There are bewildering misapplications in the nomenclature of our musical instruments, and they have caused so much misapprehension that I should be glad if this were the opportunity of pointing out some of the incorrect explanations respecting antiquated specimens which occur in modern musical literature. However, the corrections would require more space than can be afforded for them in a description of the clavichord. As regards this instrument, the circumstance that the Germans, when the pianoforte became popular, transferred the name Klavier (or Clavier), which designated the clavichord, to the square pianoforte, and the name Flügel, which designated the harpsichord, to the grand piano—because the new instruments resembled the old ones in outward appearance—has evidently contributed to the confusion.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 305).

Last month we parted from Felix Mendelssohn as he was about to leave Italy for Switzerland, and now, being able to make him wait for us as long as convenient, we rejoin him to start in company. But, before setting out, a very remarkable letter claims attention. It was written to Edward Devrient, who seems to have presumed upon close friendship, and taken our master smartly to task because, among other things, he was twenty-two years of age and "yet not famous." We have reason to thank Devrient for this, since it drew from Mendelssohn a reply that gives us remarkable insight into his nature. At first the young musician was disposed to be angry, and to believe that he and his friend were not akin. But on further reflection, he wrote words of more than mature wisdom. Hear this lad of twenty-two: "I still owe you a reply to your last letter, which put me quite out of humour for awhile, and I was on the point of thinking that in essential things we did not understand each other; when at the right moment it happily struck me not to rely on any letter, but only on the fact that after all we do understand each other. And the last thought was right, for the mood of the hour, on which the tone of the letter much depends, changes, but the essentials, such as our relations toward each other, do not." Here, in few words, we have a golden rule for the regulation of all friendly intercourse. The mood changes; the relations are untouched. What quarrels would be avoided did all men, like our young philosopher, act upon this! To the charge of being twenty-two and not yet famous, Mendelssohn first answered, jocularly we must believe, with the plea of "Kismet," saying, "If it had been the will of God that at twenty-two I should be famous, then famous I most likely should be." But this was not his real reply, which we find only as we read on: "I cannot help it, for I compose as little with a view to being famous as of becoming a Kapellmeister. It would be delightful to be both, but as long as I am not positively starving, I look upon it as my duty to compose just how and what my heart indites, and to leave the effect it will make to Him who takes heed of greater and better things. As time goes on I think more deeply and sincerely of that—to write only as I feel, to have less regard than ever to outward results, and when I have produced a piece that has flowed from my heart, whether it is afterwards to bring me fame, honours, orders, or snuff-boxes, does not concern me. We were quite agreed upon this, and it was the principal subject of a conversation we had in my little room opening on the court, in consequence of which conversation we called each other 'Du,' struck up an acquaintance, and passed some tolerably pleasant evenings together. But if you think that in my development, or in my productions, or in myself, there is anything neglected or overlooked, then tell me clearly what that is, and in what it consists." The argument enshrined in these lofty words crops up further on, when Mendelssohn adverts to Devrient's remark that he showed undue preference for religious music: "That I have lately written only sacred things was a necessity to me, just as one feels sometimes an irresistible impulse to read one certain book—it may be the Bible—and finds happiness only in reading it. If my music be like Sebastian Bach, it is again no fault of mine, for I wrote it as I felt at the time; and if the words have suggested to me the same musical thoughts that they did to old Bach, I shall value them all the more. For I know you do not mean that I copy his form without his purport; if it could be so, its emptiness would disgust me too much to write it down. I have been writing a large composition that perhaps will one day make some effect—the 'First Walpurgis-Night' of Goethe. I began it simply because it pleased and excited me; I did not think of any performance. . . . As I have always found that those pieces which I have written with the least regard for people have pleased them best, so I suppose it will be with this one. I only say this that you may see how I still hold to the practical, though generally when it is too late; but who the d—— can write music, which is the most unpractical thing in the world (that is why I love it so much), and think of what is practical. It would be much as if some one were to set his declaration of love into rhyme and metre, and write it to his lady-love." It is curious to observe here the same plea of necessity as that advanced by Wagner with regard to himself. He tells us that necessity, not choice, has made him what he is, an irresistible force impelling him from point to point. So with Mendelssohn. If he be not famous he cannot help it. If he write sacred music exclusively he cannot help it. If he reflect the style of Bach he cannot help it. In all cases he follows the impulse of his nature, and is what he is by the act of destiny. Like the Apostles of old, he knows not beforehand the words he may utter or the deeds he may perform, being subject to divine prompting and under divine direction. Who will venture to declare that this is baseless fancy in the case of greatly gifted natures? Not the present writer, assuredly.

Devrient, it appears, urged Mendelssohn to write an opera, and in the master's reply we again meet with important observations: "I respond, give me a really good text, and in a few months it shall be composed; every day I long anew to write an opera. I know I could produce something bright and fresh, but I have no words. And a libretto that does not quite kindle my enthusiasm I am determined not to set. If you know any man capable of writing an opera tell me his name, for heaven's sake; I am only looking for him. . . . I am now going to Munich, where they offered me a libretto, to see if anything in the shape of a poet is to be found there. A man who has a little luck and wit I want, he need not be a giant. . . . It always seems to me that the right fellow has not appeared yet, and what shall I do to find him out?" We know that this insistance as to a good libretto afterwards ripened into extreme fastidiousness, and was the cause why Mendelssohn allowed his life to pass without enriching the lyric drama by a single completed work. He was, as he said, perfectly ready to compose an opera, but never disposed to yield one iota of the principle laid down in the remarks just quoted. Thus, we find him again writing to Devrient, from Switzerland, in the same spirit: "I want to devote myself again as soon as possible to composition. During my whole Italian journey (which has undoubtedly advanced me much) I have, in the opinion of people, made no progress, and consequently must have gone back. I therefore want soon to show myself in something tangible. . . . The thing in which all my wishes would meet would be an opera; for I confess to you for the last six months I have had an incredible longing to set about one. I cannot think of instrumental music now, because I have nothing but voices and choruses buzzing around me, and I shall have no peace till I have worked it out. Alas! I feel that the opera I should write now would not be nearly as good as a second one that I might write hereafter, and that I must enter upon the new path that is in my thoughts, and make some way upon it before I can be sure whither it will lead me—and how soon. I already begin to feel sure in instrumental music, what I ought to strive after, and because I have accomplished more in it, work with more certainty and clearness. In short, the spirit moves me." Here we have, in another form, the same consciousness, not of will but of necessity, as that before pointed out. It was not with Mendelssohn "What shall I do?" but "What must I do?" and at this early period he was, so to speak, turning his eyes inwards and watching himself; studying the bent and promptings of his own genius as though there he saw the finger of the Lord. He chafed, however, against the restraints he imposed upon himself, and, looking at the industry of others, wished that he were permitted to work like them by the necessity which governed him. Thus, in the same most interesting letter, he said: "In the Engelberg valley I found 'Wilhelm Tell,' of Schiller, and as I read it again, I felt the old rapture and happiness at such a divine masterpiece, and at the fire and enthusiasm that breathe in it. All at once there occurred to me a word of Goethe, who, in the course of a conversation about Schiller, once said to me, 'Schiller was able to supply two five-act tragedies every year, besides other poems.' This trade expression 'supply' struck me forcibly, and as I read the fresh, glowing poem, a sense of the prodigious industry out of which it had sprung came over me, and it seemed to me as if in my life I had as yet accomplished nothing of any mark. All I have done appears to me somewhat miscellaneous; I feel as if I too would like to 'supply' something. Think me not arrogant pray, but be sure I only say this because I know what ought to be, and is not. But where I shall find such an opportunity, how I am to set about finding it, I have till this day not been able to fathom. If there is such a task for me, I shall find the opportunity—that I firmly believe; and if I do not find it I shall know it was reserved for another. But then wherefore would have been this great longing!" What an interesting state of mind do we see here! A young and ardent genius, with vague notions of fate usurping the powers of free will, stands before the dark future trying to peer into it, and wondering what he will be permitted to make of it, when the future becomes the present! The more we look at this young Mendelssohn the more we marvel at his condition. Youth, as a rule, does not stand waiting on the threshold of life for Fate to take its hand and lead it. Youth is rather disposed to try and bend circumstances to its will, exclaiming with Ancient Pistol, "The world is mine oyster which I with my sword do open." But Mendelssohn waited and listened for the divine voice. Is it always so with the divinely gifted? Are they but media, and reveal to us the wonders they are charged to communicate:

> As effortless as woodland nooks
> Send violets up and paint them blue?

So, indeed, it would seem, from the attitude of Mendelssohn and from that remarkable observation one more profound, perhaps, than he himself imagined: "If the opportunity comes to me, then I shall do this thing; if it does not so come, then I know that it is reserved for another."

Still perusing the pregnant letter from Switzerland we come upon another nugget of wisdom with regard to Opera, and the vexed question of libretti. Thus speaks our young philosopher: "The only thing that seemed to me wanting in the one libretto of yours I know, was a certain spontaneity in the incidents and characters; it appeared to me as though you still thought too much of the theatre. If you can attain to placing upon the stage men and natural actions instead of actors and scenic effects, then I am certain you will produce the best opera texts that we are likely to have; for to be versed in dramatic affairs as you are is to be unable to produce anything undramatic. And, besides, I cannot think what you would have altered in your verses. If they have sprung from within, and have been felt with reference to truth and to music, then they will be beautiful and musical, although they may not read flowingly in the libretto. For the matter of that, write prose—we will find a way to set it to music; where there is an inward need (necessity again!) the outward expression is soon found; but to transfer mere form into form, when verse is musically manufactured and not musically thought, when pretty words are spun out to hide the true life within, this, I agree with you, is a fix out of which there is no escape." If a man does not feel inwardly compelled to speak, then let him hold his tongue; but, in speaking, let him be true to his inspiration, and not bend it to arbitrarily created exigencies. This is Mendelssohn's theory: "The mouth will overflow with that which fills the heart; and so surely as that neither pure metre, good thoughts, beautiful language, will ever constitute a good poem, without a certain flash of poetry that streams through the whole, so surely an opera can only be perfectly musical (and consequently perfectly dramatic) when there is a true sense of natural life in all its characters."

Another Swiss letter on the same theme deserves attention and may best receive notice here, though much has to be passed in order to reach it. The letter is addressed to William Taubert, with whom Mendelssohn made an artistic acquaintance through some songs he met with in Italy. It is worth while to give the master's first impressions of Taubert as formed from the works in question: "The other day I met the engraver Schmidt, whom I once saw at a party at your house. His wife had brought some songs of Taubert with her, and as you had spoken about these songs, I asked her to lend them to me. They have given me a great and genuine pleasure, for there is character and soul in every one, and some phrase, some trait, which clearly tells that it is the thought of a true musician. I was also pleased on my own account, for I had begun to fear that I was becoming quite churlish and had no longer any joy in what is new; but not at all, for when the right thing appears I am truly overjoyed, and may God grant that Taubert is or is likely to be such a man as peeps out of his songs. But he must write other things besides songs, and of these not such sweet ones, but fiery ones, rough, uncouth, wild ones; he must burn and rave a little, I think, until he comes to himself. Give the man thanks and greeting from me, and tell him I had thoughts of writing to him about his songs, to shout a bravo to him across the Alps, and make a few marginal notes. Afterwards it occurred to me, however, that there were such very polite people in Berlin, who cannot bear anything of the kind and would take umbrage—in short I left it alone. Most likely you will scold me for this, but in any case write me something about him, where he stands and whether he will and must advance. The end of the 'Brook'—'Say, brooklet, does she love me?' where the brook keeps on nodding and saying 'O yes' is delicious." The foregoing passage is worth citation, not only as showing how Mendelssohn met with Taubert, but for the reason that it illustrates his generous appreciation of talent in others, and, also, something of the old patronising spirit, which with kindred qualities, experience of life was then beginning to "knock out of him." Coming now to the letter addressed to Taubert by Mendelssohn, none of us can fail to admire the graceful way in which the writer evaded the difficulties entailed by thus speaking to a man whom he had never seen. "It is quite as fitting that we should be presented to each other through the medium of music paper, as by a third person in society; indeed, I think that in the former case you feel even more intimate and confidential. Persons who introduce any one often pronounce the name so indistinctly that you seldom know who is standing before you, and they never say one word as to whether the man is gay and good-humoured or melancholy and gloomy. So we are infinitely better off. Your songs have pronounced your name clearly and plainly; they also disclose what you think and what you are; that you love music and wish to make progress; so thus, perhaps, I know you better than if we had frequently met." Could anything be more charming than this, or better adapted to place the two men, personally strangers, on good terms with one another. But the gifted young writer does not end here. He points out how cheering it is for one musician to meet with another having kindred aspirations; begs Taubert to agree that each shall fully and frankly criticise his friend's works, and asks him to communicate all about himself without reserve. Then he goes on to touch the weighty question of an opera—still the uppermost in Mendelssohn's thoughts. —"I, for my part, feel at this moment, the most invincible desire to write an opera, and have no leisure to begin any minor work. I do believe that if the libretto were given to me to-day, the opera would be written by to-morrow, so strong is my impulse towards it. Formerly, the bare idea of an opera was so exciting that I could think of nothing else when one was in my head; the sound of instruments has such a solemn and glorious effect; and yet for some time past I have laid aside a symphony that I had commenced in order to compose a cantata from Goethe, merely because it included, besides the orchestra, voices and a chorus. I intend now, indeed, to complete the symphony, but there is nothing I so strongly covet as a regular opera." At this point naturally started up the inevitable question of a libretto, which Mendelssohn proceeded to discuss almost angrily, having been irritated by some German literary Nihilists proclaiming their favourite belief that there is "nothing good and nothing true and it doesn't matter." "Where the libretto is to come from I know less than ever since last night, when for the first time for more than a year, I saw a German æsthetic paper. Things look as strange on the German Parnassus as in European politics. God help us! I was obliged to digest the supercilious Menzel, who presumed modestly to depreciate Goethe; and the supercilious Grabbe, who modestly depreciates Shakespeare, and the philosophers who proclaim Schiller to be rather trivial. Is this new, arrogant, overbearing spirit, this perverse cynicism, as odious to you as it is to me? and are you of the same opinion with myself that the first essential to an artist is to feel respect for great men, and to bow down in spirit before them, to recognise their merits, and not to endeavour to extinguish their great flame in order that his own feeble rushlight may burn a little brighter. If a person be incapable of feeling true greatness, I should like to know how he intends to make me feel it? And if all these people, with their airs of contempt, only at last succeed in producing imitations of this or that particular form, without any notion of a free, fresh creative power, which disregards individual opinion, or æsthetics or criticism, or the whole world besides, shall we not censure them? I will, for one." But from all these external sources of discouragement, Mendelssohn could turn to his own earnest mind and steady purpose for comfort. "These are truly strange, wild, and troubled times; and let those who feel that art is no more allow it, for Heaven's sake, to rest in peace; but, however roughly the storm may rage without, it cannot so quickly succeed in sweeping away the dwelling; and he who works on quietly within, fixing his thoughts on his own capabilities and purposes and not on those of others, will see the hurricane blow over, and afterwards find it difficult to realise that it was ever so violent as it appeared at the time. I have resolved to act thus as long as I can, and to pursue my path steadily, for at all events no one will deny that music still exists, and that is the chief thing."

All this time we have not gone a yard with Mendelssohn on his Swiss tour, and now we will not start till next month, for we cannot mix up the grave and important matters he has discussed with the lighter experiences of travel. When we do reach Switzerland we shall enjoy ourselves right well in the company of one who, though he could be a philosopher, could also be as gay, light-hearted, and amusing as a child.

THE TEACHERS REGISTRATION BILL.

A BILL for the Organisation and Registration of Teachers engaged in Intermediate Education in England and Wales is printed, and will be brought up for second reading in the House of Commons on the 9th inst. The Bill is prepared by Dr. Lyon Playfair, Mr. Arthur Mills, Sir John Lubbock, and Lord Francis Hervey. These names are a sufficient guarantee that whatever is intended in the several provisions of the Bill is for the best. The object of the proposed Act is of course to reach a class intermediate between the Public Schools mentioned in the Act of 1868 and the Elementary Schools of the School Board Act of 1870. It is, in short, a middle-class Education Bill, and on that account it covers the ground occupied by the major part of the musical profession.

From letters we have received from teachers of music of very high repute we find that there are clauses in the Bill which have created a certain amount of alarm. That is precisely what must be expected in the present transitional state of the question of educational reform in any Bill of the kind, however carefully worded; because the reform is intended to be radical, although the machinery has to be constructed piecemeal, and somewhere or other it will impinge on existing interests.

We do not say that there is no ground whatever for the alarm which has been expressed; but on carefully reading the different clauses of the Bill, in view of its main or general purport, we must say that in our opinion they affect infinitesimally the interests of teachers of music. The Bill seems to us to err only in the one respect particular measures of thorough reform are apt to do—that is, in being too comprehensive. In one small article in Clause 12 of the Bill under notice we observe that mention, and we may say casual mention, is made of "drawing, music, or the like." These two or more subjects have evidently been cast into the general provisions of the Bill either as an afterthought, or without due regard to the peculiarities of what the framers of the Bill themselves refer to as "special subjects."

As the time is short before the second reading of the Bill, and lest its clauses might be so strained as to affect teachers of music more than we ourselves think they do, we lay before our readers a brief abstract of its provisions.

The Bill provides for the establishment of an Educational Council for the registration and examination of teachers. The Council is to consist of sixteen members, ten of whom are to be elected by the five following bodies: the Education Department (that is, the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education), the Hebdomadal Council of the University of Oxford, the Council of the University of Cambridge, the Senate of the University of London, and the Council of the College of Preceptors. The remaining six are to be persons who have had experience in teaching, and are to be nominated by the Queen with the advice of her Privy Council, and subsequently elected by the general body of registered teachers. Of these six persons, two may be women. The Council is to form and keep a register of persons engaged as teachers in schools under the Act in question; and after a date to be hereafter determined no person can recover money for services as a teacher in schools unless he or she is registered.

The qualifications necessary in applicants for registration are that they shall be graduates of some university (British, Foreign, or Colonial), or hold a certificate either from a university, the Education Department, the College of Preceptors, or the new Council of Education.

In the case of teachers of special subjects, such as "drawing, music, or the like," it is sufficient by Article 6, Clause 12, that a person shall satisfy the Council that he or she is qualified, or by Article 7 that at the passing of the Act he or she is bonâ fide engaged as a teacher in a school under the Act. After a certain date Article 7 is to be rescinded, and the person, whether engaged in teaching or no, will have to satisfy the Council according to the terms of Article 6.

The fees for registration are £2 up to January 1, 1881, and £5 after that date. The penalty for attempting to procure registration by false declarations is imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months. The Council will have the right of removing from the register the name of any person convicted of any offence or found after due inquiry to be guilty of misconduct.

The proceedings of the Council are regulated according to the rules usual in committees of all kinds. A quorum is to consist of not less than three members; and in measures of importance, such as for example the removal of a name from the register, seven days' notice of the meeting must be given to each member of the Council. The Council will have the usual power of delegating its authority to sub-committees, and apparently, by Clause 24, to examiners who are not members of the Council. At least, it is not clearly stated in that clause whether the persons to be appointed as examiners are or are not members of the Council.

By a supplemental Clause in the Bill additional powers are to be granted to the College of Preceptors to provide for the training and examination of all teachers in schools under the Act who are not graduates or holders of certificates. The institution in Queen Square some of us have heard of as the "College of Preceptors" already examines candidates for certain professions, such as, for instance, pharmacy; but the examination is purely preliminary, and is confined to Latin and arithmetic and so forth, and has nothing to do with the "special subject." What is to be the extent of the "additional powers" we have yet to learn.

Many teachers of music, no doubt, have read the "Teachers Organisation and Registration Bill," under the notion that all its stipulations might be extended to them; and they have naturally asked the question, "What is to become of those amongst us who are not graduates, or who are not holders of certificates, or who are not teachers in schools under the Act, or in any school at all? Are we to submit to the indignity of an examination when, with a lifetime's experience we are not only able to teach pupils, but in our special vocation are well qualified to teach the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council and the Educational Council itself? In the other alternative, we lose the advantage which will always influence the vulgar, of being branded with a university trade mark or the government broad arrow. We feel too conscious that, before long, to be out of livery will be to be out of place."

To all that, there are only two answers. Firstly, in the very incidental manner in which "special subjects" are alluded to at all in the Bill, there is a provision for existing teachers in schools under the Act, as well as for people otherwise known to be qualified, but who may have to submit to a mere formality. Secondly, there are many of us who are obliged to remember that large measures of social reform cannot easily be adapted to existing conditions, and are made for another generation or even another régime. In a question between preserving the new wine or the old bottles, popular prejudice will decide in favour of the wine. But when everything is said, there are certain possible objections to the new Bill from the music teacher's point of view. These objections will, in all cases, refer to the choice of examiners nominated by bodies who are themselves unqualified in special subjects.

Writing in the name of a periodical devoted to one of the special subjects named in the Bill, we venture to suggest to Dr. Lyon Playfair and his coadjutors that the only way out of the difficulty, the only way to keep their heads clear of a hornets' nest and to secure to themselves leisure to attend to the main objects of their Bill, is simply to expunge Articles 6 and 7 from Clause 12. If they do not do so, they run the chance of repeating legislative errors which have already been made in regard to musical education in the elementary schools. The whole subject of musical education is certain in a year or two to come before Parliament. Until then it had better be left without further peddling or being muddled up as an incidental point in the question of general educational reform. The only certificate for pupil or teacher a musician will recognise is the certificate of the music-school—the Conservatorium. It is doubtful if even now an English university musical degree is more than a vanity. Not long ago, a man left his stool in a country organ-loft and studied a few ancient rules in canon and counterpoint, and got his Mus. Doc. degree without more than a smattering of merely academical knowledge, or knowing the right end from the wrong of an orchestral instrument, and with the faintest notions of the scope, tendency, and appliances of modern art. Such things could never happen in our promised Conservatorium. In the meantime we recommend Dr. Lyon Playfair and his friends to render unto hebdomadal councils the things which belong to hebdomadal councils in their respective universities, and to leave music alone.

Amongst the interesting relics shown at the recent Moore Centenary celebration in Dublin were the poet's writing-table, the bible in which his children's names are written, the original manuscripts of some of his melodies, and his small harp, given by Mrs. Moore five-and-twenty years ago to the Royal Irish Academy. Associations cling around such strictly personal articles as these, which tend to keep alive the memory of departed great men; and we can quite understand the desire to possess portions of Shakespeare's mulberry tree, or to wear on your finger the diamond ring without which Haydn declared that he could not compose. But the most enthusiastic collector of these curiosities will allow that their value diminishes in proportion to the doubt thrown on their authenticity. Had we, then, seen an advertisement that the pianoforte to which Beethoven wrote his "Adieu," or the identical billiard-ball which, rolling down the staircase, suggested to Mozart the subject of the Overture to "Zauberflöte" were to be disposed of, we could not have been more astonished than when we met, amongst the items in a catalogue at a recent sale in London, "the original anvil and hammer of the 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' from which Handel composed his celebrated melody." In the pages of this journal we have lately called attention to the fact of the whole story of the "Harmonious Blacksmith" being a pure fabrication, and also to the testimony—amounting almost to positive proof—that Handel did not compose the air at all. The burden of proof undoubtedly, therefore, rests with the possessor of these relics; for the mere production of an article in court, for example, would not be admitted by a jury as evidence that a man stole it. Let us be lenient, however, and say that if Handel wrote the air, and if the blows of a hammer suggested the melody, then it is possible that this may be the anvil and hammer to which we are indebted for striking out, by aid of the "blacksmith's" hands, so beautiful a subject.

We are positively inundated with books expressly designed, by an easy process, to teach students the rudiments of music. On all these an intimation is conveyed, either from the publisher or the author, that they are "for review;" and in most cases they are also accompanied by a number of notices, extracted from journals real or imaginary, that each book is the only one by which a knowledge of the principles of the art can be rapidly gained. Now we candidly confess that our great difficulty in saying anything upon these works in our reviewing columns is that they are really all alike. It is true that this objection may apply also to the majority of the compositions expressly designed for that receptacle of mediocrity, the "drawing-room;" but then when one, for example, is called "Dashing Spray" and another "Bubbling Water," it is obvious that those accustomed to "Aquatic Fireworks" will at once recognise a difference. Treatises, however, in which the elements of music are explained, and always explained in the same manner, baffle us completely. Would not our readers, for instance, be surprised were we to write thus: "We perfectly agree with our author when he says that the names of the notes on the lines of the treble staff are E, G, B, D, F; and we applaud his acuteness in discovering that the letters of the notes in the spaces spell the word 'face'?" Or, "The excellent wording of the sentence, 'A dot after a note makes it half as long again,' renders the subject as clear as possible, even to the youngest student." There can be no doubt that many professors find these books useful, both in a lucrative point of view and as proving that they really understand what they teach; but we can have nothing whatever to do with this. As contributions to art they are worthless, because they contain no opinions, good or bad; and we should be glad if it were generally understood that we cannot turn aside from our more important work to help them forward.

St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, is certainly taking the lead in introducing the sacred compositions of the great masters at its ordinary Sunday services, for we find that on Trinity Sunday Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given by a choir of 125 voices, with a complete and efficient orchestra. This is the sixth important sacred work that Archdeacon Dunbar (the incumbent) has had at this church within nine months; and, as we hear that the excellent choir taking part in these performances has been trained by Mr. Stedman, there can be little doubt that the presentation of such standard works is intended to be continued at stated intervals. In addition to thus proving his love for sacred music, it is evident that Archdeacon Dunbar is determined to introduce a reform in the method of procuring singers for the church, since in one of his recent sermons he observed that the days of amateur church musicians had, he hoped, passed away; and that he looked forward to the time when a candidate for the post of minor canon of a cathedral will be expected to have a degree in music, just as a candidate for a town curacy is expected to have a degree in arts. We are also informed that at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Grove Street, Commercial Road East, a portion of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation" was sung at evening service on the 13th ult., the choir being augmented by contingents from the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, Mr. William Carter's Choir, &c. At both these churches applicants for tickets are "invited" to contribute—the first towards the choir expenses, and the second towards the Organ Repair Fund; but as we think these subscriptions should be entirely voluntary, we are sorry to see that at St. John the Evangelist the sum of "one shilling per seat" is so decisively named as to make it almost appear that the tickets are actually sold.

Our readers will, we are certain, forgive us if for once we draw attention to a subject only indirectly connected with music. We desire to know whether at our operatic establishments it is at all possible to organise some system by which vehicles shall be procurable at the conclusion of the performance. On a very crowded night during the past month, when it rained in torrents, accompanied by thunder and lightning, we happen to know that not a carriage of any kind was to be had by those who had not secured one in the early part of the evening. Ladies and gentlemen, in full dress, tired of waiting at the doors, paraded the streets, drenched with wet, the cabmen mildly meeting their entreaties, even to drive them a short distance, by ominously shaking their heads. This, of course, might mean that they were engaged; but in proof that such, at least, was not always the reason, we may mention that one man who had refused a fare graciously relented on being offered a sovereign; feeling, we presume, that as he had thus made a "bargain," his victim was powerless to retaliate. Now, when passengers arrive at a railway terminus the regularly appointed vehicles belonging to the company are there to receive them. Why, then, should there not be the same convenience at our Opera-houses? Surely, at the end of the performance, cabs properly licensed for the occasion could be sent in a continuous stream to the doors until every one had departed, and persons might pass into them in regular order, as they pass in at the pit door of a theatre. So salutary a reform would, we are certain, be thoroughly appreciated; for even the most enthusiastic visitor to the Opera can scarcely sufficiently enjoy the music if he is conscious that when it is over he must either get soaked to the skin, or bribe a man with a sovereign to drive him a distance, perhaps, of two miles.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Madame Gerster has been warmly received at this establishment during the past month; and Mdlle. Vanzandt has increased the favourable impression produced on her début by her singing and acting in the part of Cherubino, in "Le Nozze di Figaro." Signor Fancelli has reappeared with his accustomed success in several of the leading tenor parts; and a marked impression has been produced by M. Roudil as the Jester in Verdi's "Rigoletto." He has a fine baritone voice, exceptionally good in the high part of the register, and his singing and acting prove that he has cultivated his natural gifts with care and judgment. The production of Verdi's "Aïda" satisfies the eye, if it somewhat disappoints the ear. The artistic scenery and gorgeous dresses and decorations will well repay a visit to those who admire such accessories, and we sincerely hope that the lessee may be amply repaid for his lavish expenditure. Mdlle. Kellogg, as Aïda, sings well throughout an extremely arduous part, and Madame Trebelli, Signori Campanini and Galassi exerted themselves to the utmost; but the musical value of "Aïda" is but of secondary importance, and if the Opera attract it will be for the spectacle. No novelty has been produced, and we do not even see one looming in the distance.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The first appearance of Madame Adelina Patti as Selika, in Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," has been one of the few events of the past month. Of course every character this accomplished singer undertakes must have both vocal and histrionic points of the utmost interest; but, on the whole, we are not inclined to consider the Indian Queen as one of Madame Patti's best parts. Certainly she had just recovered from an illness; but with every allowance for this, amidst much that calls for unqualified praise, there were occasional passages where the music scarcely seemed to suit her; and this, we think, was felt by the audience. Mdlle. Valleria materially added to her already high reputation by her singing in the small part of Inez, and as the slave, Nelusko, M. Lassalle achieved a success such as we rarely witness. With an excellent baritone voice, carefully cultivated in every part of the register, he unites a capacity for acting such as cannot fail to place him in the highest rank of his profession; and his reception was enthusiastic, to a degree quite remarkable, considering the usually impassive audience at this establishment. Mdlle. Bloch's début as Leonora in "La Favorita" produced no effect. The voice is worn, and her appearance is unsuited for such a character; but she sang well as Fides in "Le Prophète," and received a fair share of applause. Mdlle. Louise Pyk, who made her first appearance as the heroine in "Il Trovatore," has a thin soprano voice, and but few natural gifts for the position to which she aspires. The Marquis d'Ivry's "Les Amants de Vérone" was withdrawn, as we anticipated, after the second night; and M. Massenet's opera, "Il Re di Lahore," is announced too late for notice in our present number.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

At the seventh Concert, on the 14th ult., Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony was the principal orchestral piece; and as criticism upon the performances instead of upon the works is now all that this Society calls upon us for, we may record that the Symphony was throughout well played. Herr Jaell's rendering of Schumann's pianoforte Concerto was a marked success, as was also Senor Sarasate's performance of Raff's Suite for violin and orchestra (Op. 180); the last-named artist indeed being positively overwhelmed with applause, and thrice recalled. The vocalist was Miss Emma Thursby. At the eighth and last Concert, on the 2nd inst., a Symphony in E minor, by Professor Macfarren, will be performed for the first time.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

This Choir, the continued existence of which rumour is now unhappily and, we hope, untruly threatening, gave its last Subscription Concert of the present season in St. James's Hall on the 19th ult. There was a very large attendance, as is always the case when the programme contains those masterpieces of English vocal music for an admirable interpretation of which the Choir has so long been noted. Most of the concerted pieces were old favourites, and call for no more than mention. At their head, not only in order but in dignity and value, stood the elder Wesley's magnificent motett, "In exitu Israel," and after it came Pearsall's "Sir Patrick Spens," Gaul's setting of "The better land," which, as usual, obtained liberal applause; Benet's exquisite "Flow, O my tears"—an abiding example of how a master can combine science and sentiment; Callcott's "There is a garden in her face," conducted by the clever composer, and Wilbye's ever-welcome "Sweet honey-sucking bees." The second part of the programme contained things to match, as, for example, Leslie's prize madrigal, "Thine eyes so bright," Walter Macfarren's "You stole my love," which met with its usual encore; Pinsuti's "In this hour of softened splendour," and Stevens's "Cloud-capt towers." The mere names of these well-known and highly esteemed compositions amply serve to indicate the enjoyment of the audience, especially as it may be taken for granted that one and all were sung in a style not far short of perfection. But when estimating the pleasurable results of this concert, we must give prominence to the efforts of the soloists, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, and Mr. Santley. Each of these ladies and gentlemen contributed one or more songs, besides which they joined their voices in the quintett, "She will tend him, nurse him, mend him," from Sullivan's "Sorcerer," the composer accompanying on the pianoforte. We trust that this comic performance may be regarded as a mere jeu d'esprit, wholly exceptional in character. If not, then its introduction was a mistake, although the audience applauded and laughed their loudest. We look for bouffe business elsewhere than to the concerts of Mr. Leslie's Choir. The various songs need not be referred to in detail, but mention should be made of the great success achieved by Mr. Maas in "Annabelle Lee," which, charmingly sung, was encored with enthusiasm. An extra concert will be given, "by special desire of the Prince and Princess of Wales," on the 7th inst.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

THE closing days of June were this year more noticeable than ever for the wind-up of musical enterprises, and among the "seasons" then brought to an end was that of the Viard-Louis Orchestral Concerts, the final performance taking place in St. James's Hall on the 18th. One at least of our contemporaries has hinted that the word "final" might be applied to this concert in a more extended sense. We know not on what authority the writer based his assertion, nor perhaps is it worth while to inquire, since Madame Viard-Louis herself declares that full particulars of the third season, to begin early in October, will appear in due course. It is clear that Madame Viard-Louis must, better than anybody else, know her own intentions; and we therefore hope still to enjoy the advantages of a most liberal enterprise and most admirable performances. The last concert of the season was distinguished by the production of novelties, in further continuation of an already long list. A propos to these, cavilling may seem ungracious, but it is necessary to point out that a new thing is not good because new, nor is the fact that a work has not yet been heard a sufficient reason for performance. Sound judgment and discretion should guide the choice of novelty, and the best of the competitors for approval should have preference. That this rule is not always observed in connection with Madame Viard-Louis's Concerts we need not stop to show, any more than we need be careful to prove that a change of policy is desirable. At the head of the works introduced to notice on the 18th stood a Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, by Herr Oscar Raif, a professor at the Royal Academy of Berlin. Respecting the number and character of this gentleman's compositions we confess ignorance, and, perhaps, ought to do so with shame. But there is reason for believing that the number cannot be great, else Herr Raif would hardly have chosen his Opus 1 on an occasion which placed him before the English public both as composer and solo pianist. The concerto is obviously the production of a man whose full strength has not been developed by exercise, and it can make no claim whatever to be considered great. But while marked by the qualities for which we naturally look in a premier essay, the work has several positive merits tending to show that Herr Raif may, in time to come, attain distinction. It is full of melody, not always original truly, but an original melody is very far to seek now-a-days; it is further marked by individuality, while adhering to established form; and many passages evince considerable power of imagination and grace of style. The opening movement, because exacting most, is the least satisfactory; but the Romance, a quasi Adagio, conceived in the spirit and expressed in the manner of Schubert, is quite successful; while the Finale comes only a little short of the same result. To sum up, the Concerto is a promising work, and we are curious to know what those which have followed or may follow it are or will be like. Herr Raif played his own music with a decided purpose and in a style so satisfactory to the audience that he was twice recalled amid great applause. The second novelty was a Minuet for orchestra by Mr. Joseph Williams, respecting which we will only say that it proved the composer's right to be heard, and also to the privilege of bringing forward another work more pretentious in character. Last of all came an overture, "Patrie," by Georges Bizet, written for the Pasdeloup Concerts shortly before the opera "Carmen." The overture is not in ordinary form, but consists of a series of divisions like the cantos of a poem, evidently intended to express a sequence of ideas in the mind of the composer. What those ideas were we can never know, and the work unavoidably suffers by the want of a key to its meaning. Nevertheless, its melody, power, and picturesque orchestration cannot fail to charm, while making clear that no ordinary gifts are in evidence. Besides these new things, Mr. Weist Hill introduced Spohr's "Power of Sound," giving the audience a performance of that work such as they are not likely soon to forget. Madame Viard-Louis's solo was Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata; and the vocalists were Madame Mary Cummings and Signor Candidus.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW'S RECITALS.

THE appearance of this pianoforte virtuoso par excellence, looked upon as it invariably is as a special event during our concert season, never fails to attract proportionately numerous audiences, and the present two Recitals, given at St. James's Hall on the 16th and 23rd ult. respectively, have been no exception to the rule. We have so frequently expressed our admiration for the many great and in some respects unique artistic qualities by which Dr. von Bülow's performances are distinguished, while taking exception to what may be termed an exuberance of individuality from which, to our thinking, his interpretation of classical masterpieces frequently suffers, that we need not revert to these characteristics in the present instance, the performances we speak of presenting, moreover, no novel features in the exhibition of the great pianist's executive powers. Again, in the rendering of the numerous compositions constituting the respective programmes, the unparalleled retentive powers of the concert-giver and his great physical endurance were conspicuous concomitants of his artistic interpretations; while on the second of the two occasions the variety of works presented gave him the opportunity of displaying to the best advantage the great versatility of his talents. The programme of the first Recital consisted exclusively of compositions by Beethoven, opening with the Sonata Op. 57 (surnamed Appassionata), including also the thirty-two variations in C minor, the fifteen variations, with the fugue, in E flat, and the two Sonatas (or Sonatines as Dr. von Bülow styles them) in F minor (Op. 54) and F sharp minor (Op. 78). The second and last Recital was, as already stated, of a varied character as regards the programme, commencing with a masterly rendering of the Fantaisie Chromatique et Fugue by J. S. Bach, and concluding with two pieces by Chopin, thus covering the two extreme points of a long interval of the development of the art, which was likewise represented by the names of Gluck (air from "Iphigénie en Aulide"), Mozart (air from "Belmont and Constanze"), Beethoven (Sonata, Op. 109, in E major), and Schumann ("Wiener Faschingschwank). The concert included moreover an interesting novelty in the performance of a "Turkish Rhapsody" by Balakireff, a Russian composer, as well as a curious exhibition of the marvellous technique of the pianist in his performance of Three Sketches for the left hand alone, by Rheinberger, which elicited boundless applause.

Herr Anton Schott, of the Royal Opera of Hanover, who on both occasions was the vocalist, proved himself an excellent interpreter of both lyrical and dramatic songs, although we preferred hearing him in the latter, for which his fine declamatory style and robust though sympathetic tenor voice seem to be eminently suited. The singer, who made his début in England during these recitals, has nothing to complain of as regards the reception accorded to him by his audience, and will, we trust, soon make his appearance again in this country.

HERR XAVER SCHARWENKA'S CONCERTS.

THERE was a somewhat thin attendance at these Concerts, which took place at St. James's Hall on the afternoons of the 11th and 19th ult., particularly on the former occasion, owing partly no doubt to the inclemency of the weather, and partly also to the fact that in the existing superabundance of more or less able pianists claiming the attention of the musical public, even exceptional merit finds it difficult to obtain, at a bound, the general recognition it deserves. That Herr Scharwenka possesses such exceptional artistic qualities, none who value poetic warmth of interpretation combined with great executive skill, and an individuality of style which, although most marked, is entirely free from obtrusiveness, will be prepared to deny. These rare qualities indeed were conspicuous throughout the programme of the first Recital, which was supported entirely by the pianist referred to, there being not even the always welcome and, we think, judicious interspersion of vocal soli. Among the works which obtained a hearing were Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata and pieces by Pergolesi, Schumann, Liszt, and Chopin. In the interpretation of the last-mentioned composer, Herr Scharwenka appears to us to excel, the very eccentricities of the Polish tone-poet seeming to become invested with a new meaning under his hands. It may be questioned whether the Abbé Liszt's arrangement for the pianoforte of Rossini's "Tell" overture, with which the Recital concluded, was altogether in keeping with the general character of the programme, but it was nevertheless capitally executed.

The second was a Chamber Concert, which introduced two of Herr Scharwenka's more ambitious compositions, viz., a Quartett (Op. 37) for pianoforte and stringed instruments, and a Trio (Op. 45) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in both of which the eminent pianist fully justified the reputation which he has already gained on the Continent as a composer. Of the two works, both of which bear distinct evidence of considerable talent, the Trio appears to us the more important, being also more uniformly conceived; while the Quartett is somewhat diffuse in character and, chiefly for that reason, too lengthy, a fault which the interest attaching to the various themes scarcely atones for. Herr Scharwenka was ably assisted in the rendering of the chamber-music by Herren Franke, Heimendahl, and Van Biene.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

WE have high authority for believing that it is the duty of every man, when he has lighted a candle, to put it where the light can be seen, and, not only so, but to choose a place where it can be best seen. On this principle Mr. Ebenezer Prout and the managers of the above musical Association have acted. Till the 4th of last month the radiance of their skill and energy illumined only the distant region of Shoreditch, having the Town Hall of that historical parish as its centre. But the "Borough of Hackney Choral Association" could not remain merely a local body, and on the day named chiefs and subordinates came down to take possession of St. James's Hall, and show Central London what can be done in the far north-east. In this step there was nothing of vainglory. The Hackney amateurs did not say to each other "Let us go and assert our powers," but rather "Let us go and demonstrate the powers of our conductor." Mr. Ebenezer Prout had, in truth, written a Cantata, and his faithful followers were zealous that the fact and all it involved should be made as public as possible, by a performance of the work at the head-quarters of metropolitan music. Honour to them on this account, and right glad must be every one who sympathises with generous feeling that the result was a success. For ourselves, we trust it will not be long ere the Borough of Hackney Choral Association again descends upon St. James's Hall under conditions exactly similar.

The Cantata we have now to consider is, we believe, Mr. Prout's first production of the kind. As our readers know, he has written several important works for orchestra alone, and voices and instruments combined; but till now has shrunk from testing his powers in the serious and exacting department to which his new composition belongs. Having determined upon the effort, it must be said for him that the initial steps were wisely taken. Mr. Prout was lucky, first of all, in choosing his subject. The story of Hereward, so admirably told by Charles Kingsley, is not, it is true, as well-known as that of Robin Hood or William Wallace. To the popular mind the Saxon hero who, from his fastness in the Fens, kept Norman power at bay, as well as being mythical, is an obscure personage, about whose qualities and deeds the mist of doubt hangs. But this apart, the story of Hereward cannot be "said or sung" without a quickening of the pulse, and an excitation of all the sympathy and admiration which brave deeds call forth, even in those who are physically and morally incapable of emulating them. Hereward was a true hero, as heroes went in his time, and, happily, patriotism is such an enduring virtue, that we possess both a key to his character and a bond of union with him in his purpose. Lucky in having such a theme, Mr. Prout was scarcely less fortunate in obtaining the literary co-operation of Mr. William Grist. It is true that objection may be made to some features in the poem regarded as verses for music; but even after giving due weight to this, the fact remains that Mr. Grist's work is far above the average. The story is told with spirit and feeling, the structure of the poem is good, and we can detect in it the occasional fragrance—so precious, that even a little in a libretto is priceless—of true poetry. One feature in Mr. Grist's book deserves particular notice—we refer to the use now and then of alliterative verse on the model, save for a final rhyme, of the Scandinavian sagas. Mr. Grist was wise not to employ this form exclusively, as did Wagner in his "Ring des Nibelungen," since it quickly becomes monotonous, and as much a "bore" as a mannerism can be. He was wise, again, to employ it only where a demand arose for strong and vigorous—we had almost said rough and rude—expression. Thus Hereward's boisterous rowdies sing in fitting strains :—

Landless and lawless
Free fighters fare we,
To princes nor prelates
Brow never bare we.
Wild as the wehr-wolf,
Risk never ruing,
Gay as the sun-gleam,
Daring and doing.

No other form of verse, we may safely say, would so well answer the desired purpose in this and similar instances as the one of which the above affords an example. Mr. Grist should further be complimented upon having laid out the story with a due regard to a proper procession of incidents. It is sometimes hard to logically set forth an "argument" and also secure necessary variety and contrast; but in the present instance the difficulty is so well got over that no cause of complaint arises. How far these remarks are justified by facts will appear as we go through the details of the work.

The Cantata opens with a brief orchestral introduction (Andante maestoso) in which the leit-motives, or representative themes subsequently employed are grouped together. Other significance than this the movement does not assume. At its close the story opens before Leofric's castle at Bourne, and Hereward's followers sing the chorus, some words from which are cited above. The music of this number is very vigorous and bold, the orchestra moving largely in unison with a reckless dash both appropriate and suggestive; the voices meanwhile entering with short phrases or detached chords in close and massive harmony. To this the next number is a striking contrast. Shifting to the interior of the castle, we hear Godiva and her ladies sing a "Salve Regina" in four parts (Adagio). Again the music has a decided character, a long way removed from commonplace, as two or three bars suffice to show:—

In the spirit of this extract the whole prayer is written. Action now begins. Herluin, the monk, enters (preceded by trombones), complaining to Godiva of having been robbed and insulted by Hereward and his roysterers. Mr. Prout here shows himself not deficient in dry humour. Through the gravity of the priest's manner and matter runs a vein of comedy the more amusing because it only, so to speak, just peeps out. Godiva answers, bewailing the conduct of her son, who now joins the discussion with bitter words against Herluin, and prognostications of his own future greatness. At this point a Hereward motive comes to the front:—

Godiva nevertheless decrees her son's banishment, which is followed by a short trio cleverly combining the leading themes of the solos previously sung by the dramatis personæ. In all this there is no lack of force and characterisation. Indeed, the action of these qualities gives good reason for surprise. Hereward next sings a solo, "Farewell, my boyhood's home," in which tender sentiment and manly resolution present a happy contrast; and then the scene closes with a contrast far more bold. Hereward's followers, accompanied by the impetuous orchestral unisons, resume their boisterous chorus, upon which breaks in the "Salve Regina" of the ladies, much as in "Les Huguenots" the hymn of the Catholic women is combined with the Rataplan of the soldiers. The device is worked by Mr. Prout with rare cleverness, and the result is one of which he may fairly be proud.

Part II. shifts the scene to St. Omer, and shows us the home of Torfrida, whose ladies beguile the time by singing a light-hearted chorus, "Bright is the day," of a somewhat conventional, though pleasing character. Torfrida, in love with Hereward, muses upon his worth and her own happiness, while a motive, henceforth her representative, is heard:—

The scena which follows is somewhat extended and not without points of merit. Both here, however, and in the duet which ensues when Hereward presents himself victorious from the tournament, Mr. Prout is not up to the mark attained elsewhere. His love-music is too measured. It wants passion, "go," verve—whatever the word may be that best describes the quality which in emotional situations "carries one away." Mr. Prout, for a cure of this defect, should take a bath of the best Italian art, and absorb some of the spirit that there may be found in perfection. Following the duet comes a Bridal March and chorus best described by the word pretty—though the ensemble at the close is grand—and therfore certain to be popular. With this Part II. ends.

When Part III. begins we are back again at Bourne, and find England in evil case. The foot of the Conqueror is on her neck, and the people mournfully sing of their woes. We hold this chorus, "Mourn, Anglia, mourn," to be one of the best, if not absolutely the best number in the work. It combines with a free use of modern forms of expression the majesty and power of Handel, who, one cannot but think, had some share in the inspiration of its ensemble passages. But, however this may be, no question arises as to the value of the music. Its technique is masterful and its expression complete. In the next number we return to St. Omer. Leofwin, a Saxon page, brings news to Hereward of Hastings and Harold, and William's triumph, relating these dismal tidings in a solo of a highly varied character, albeit Mr. Prout here illustrates his tendency to treat in lyrical style that which should be made purely dramatic. The opening section of the solo, for example, no way suggests the purport of its text. Hereward receives the news with fitting emotion, and, to the accompaniment of his heroic motive, determines upon avenging his king and country. An aria follows, recalling past joys and anticipating coming troubles, but resolving upon gallant deeds. Leaving St. Omer, we next find ourselves upon the sea, in company with Hereward and his men, who sing a chorus, "Wafted by east wind," remarkable above all for an appropriate and masterly accompaniment. The swell of the waves, and the brightness and animation of the scene, could hardly be better depicted in the forms and colours of tone. From the waste of the German Ocean this changeful drama now takes us to the Court of the Conqueror, at Winchester, where we gather from a dialogue between William and Roland, his Herald, that Hereward has reached England and bidden defiance to Norman might. William accepts the challenge, and in a somewhat commonplace air, "My liegemen who never to honour have failed," bids his soldiers do their duty. Upon this errand they set forth to the strains of a dignified March, not inappropriate as suggesting the strength and solidity of those motley but formidable warriors. Leaving William's troops on the road, we precede them to the Fens, and enter the famous Camp of Refuge at Ely, where, amid the sound of martial music, we hear the Torfrida motive, and know that Hereward's bride has come to share his fortunes. As befits her knightly race she is now in warlike mood, and cheers her husband's followers with a vigorous song, "Hail, Saxons, hail, your light restored." Hereward himself takes up the strain, and presently the soldiers also join. Then we hear William's voice, accompanied by the theme of the March, inspiring the men on his side, and next the conflict begins, Saxons and Normans singing against each other as vigorously as they fight. Mr. Prout's power of combination is even more conspicuous in this ensemble than in the previous case. But it is combination without restraint. The music runs freely on, representing the excitement, impetuosity, and hurly-burly of battle in a manner we find hard to overpraise. The fight ends, as it should, with the defeat of William, and the scene closes upon contrasted triumph and humiliation.

Part IV. and last opens at the Norman Court. Alftruda has done that which William failed to accomplish. With her woman's wiles she has seduced Hereward from Torfrida, and now brings him submissive to the Conqueror's feet. All the emotions of her victory are expressed in a jubilant air, "Hail, the might of woman, hail." This song is capitally conceived and written, having a character of its own, and well suggesting the vainglorious delight with which Alftruda contemplates the power of her charms. A trio for Alftruda, William, and Hereward follows, from which, as calling for no special remark, we pass to a chorus of Normans, "Gleemen, lift a tuneful strain," a number certain to win favour by reason of its simple structure and melodic interest. Here we take a final leave of the Norman Court, and go back for the last time to Bourne, where a catastrophe is impending. Hereward, restless and unhappy, reproaches himself for having lost Torfrida's love and sacrificed his country's cause. To the strain of the Torfrida motive he calls upon his wife with a mystic feeling that his last hour is come. And that feeling is right. A band of Norman assassins rush in, but Hereward does not tamely yield. All the warrior arises in him and, calling his brother to his side, out flashes the terrible sword. All that follows is so dramatically set forth by words and music that we seem to look on as one Norman after another bites the dust, as the hero's brother falls, as Hereward tenderly laments the slain, as he again addresses himself to the unequal combat, as borne down by numbers he is wounded to death, and as, calling upon Torfrida, he yields up his mighty soul. The whole situation is most excitingly illustrated, and makes us wish that there were an English stage affording scope for powers such as are here shown. Attracted by the noise of conflict, Torfrida enters, and over Hereward's dead body renews the love which wiles and weakness had impaired. Then the voice of lamentation is heard, the Saxons singing a chorus, "Weep for the Viking slain," most remarkable for genuine pathos and power. This is truly a masterpiece worthy of association with its predecessor, "Mourn, Anglia, mourn"—than which, in the way of comparing Mr. Prout with himself, we know no higher praise. But the chorus is worthy of any living composer, we care not who he may be. The Finale is now reached. In a state of ecstasy, Torfrida speaks of the greatness of the England to come, and, as the forerunner and type of the English of the future, Hereward is bidden "Sleep on, great heart, in glory sleep," the accompanying music being worthy of such a triumphant strain. Our summing-up need not be long. "Hereward" is an honour to native art. We point to it with pride as a good thing achieved, and with hope as the first of many that shall even excel it in worth.

Small space is left for a notice of the performance, which could hardly have been better. Mr. Prout himself conducted; the orchestra did its work well, and the chorus was remarkable for the perfection of its training to this special task; while the soloists—Mrs. Osgood, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian Williams, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. King—exerted themselves one and all with an effect most creditable to their skill and conscientiousness. In point of fact, "Hereward" derived uncommon advantage from the nature of its presentation, and the result was that the audience received the work with unbounded applause.

The most important Concert during the last Commemoration Week at Oxford was that of the Philharmonic Society, given in the Sheldonian Theatre on the 16th ult. The programme comprised two items by Dr. Sullivan—his Cantata, "On Shore and Sea," and the "Ouvertura di Ballo"—Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, two Pianoforte Solos by Raff and Rubinstein, the "Ruy Blas" Overture, and the "Loreley" finale by Mendelssohn. General regret was expressed that a stronger work was not chosen to represent Dr. Sullivan, a few days before an honorary degree was conferred upon him; and this feeling somewhat damped the applause. The performance was fair. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Annie Marriott and Mr. Frederick King, who did them full justice. The band was admirable and played the Mendelssohn Overture very finely, but the choir was deficient in tone and not always accurate. On the whole the best performance was the chorus of Christian Sailors in "On Shore and Sea." Mdlle. Mehlig achieved the success of the concert, and received a hearty encore for her pianoforte solos.——Four Colleges, as usual, gave concerts during the Commemoration—Pembroke on the 12th, Queen's on the 13th, New College on the 17th, and Magdalen on the 18th. The Pembroke programme was most creditable for a small College. It possesses two good soloists in Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Tuckwell; and Mr. Cumberlege played some solos by Schumann with great delicacy. Not many years ago such a concert would have taxed the strength of every College in Oxford combined.——On the following evening the Queen's College Musical Society gave a highly effective performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" as the first part of the programme. The band played well, and the choir sang with much precision and taste. The finished style of Mr. St. Pattrick and the powerful voice of Mr. Anstice told to much advantage in the tenor music, and Mr. A. J. Tuckwell sang "O ruddier than the cherry" in an excellent manner. There was one especial feature of interest in the performance, viz., that the chorus "Smiling Venus" was sung, probably for the first time since Handel's own day. It may be safely said that all who heard it would be glad to hear it again. Amongst the items of the second part were Haydn's "Toy Symphony" (which was given with good effect) and Pepusch's Cantata "Alexis." The last-mentioned piece and "Acis" were prefaced by notes of great interest, too long unfortunately to be reproduced here. After saying so much in praise of a really good and interesting concert, we feel bound to make two complaints. Part-songs by an eminent composer like Dr. Macfarren should be well rehearsed before performance, and all musicians would prefer Haydn's original "Wachtel" in his "Toy Symphony" to Messrs. Barnett Samuel's "Original" Ocarina, which was arbitrarily substituted for it.——The next Concert we shall mention was that of New College, on the 17th ult. The part-singing throughout the programme was very fine indeed, the best performances being Sullivan's "The long day closes," Hiller's "Spring-time" and Von Wartensee's "The wanderer's night song." The solo singing was, however, very inferior, and some reform in this department is really imperative.——Lastly, on the very night of the Encænia, the 18th ult., came Magdalen Concert. The part-singing again was excellent: indeed, in these days the lover of madrigals does not often get such an opportunity as at this concert of hearing his favourite compositions worthily rendered. No soloist's names were given, but a high level of excellence was secured in this department. The best thing in the concert, however, was Rubinstein's two-part song "The songs of the birds," sung to perfection by the boys of the choir. The two great defects observable in the concerts were a want of novelty in the programmes, and a want of decision in resisting encores, but we are bound to say that Queen's formed an honourable exception in both points. Its programme contained two most interesting novelties, and several firm attempts at an encore were as firmly resisted. But at New College every encore was eagerly responded to. The theatre was crowded when Dr. Macfarren, Sir H. Oakeley, and Dr. Sullivan received their honorary degrees; and in leaving Oxford, after the experience of the last few days, we cannot but feel strengthened in the belief that the University is now duly recognising the real claims both of music and musicians in this country.

On Monday, the 9th ult., the testimonial recently subscribed for by the friends and admirers of Mr. W. Done, Organist of Worcester Cathedral, in acknowledgment of his private worth and general services to the cause of music in the city and county, was presented to that gentleman at the County Club, Foregate Street, by Earl Beauchamp. The presentation was attended with no ceremonial and was of an unostentatious character. The testimonial consisted of a purse and a richly engraved solid silver inkstand, with two ink-bottles and upright taper-stand between. Upon the front in a shield is the following inscription:—

This inkstand, together with a purse of 344 sovereigns, was presented by the Earl Beauchamp on behalf of himself and 222 other friends to William Done, Esq., Organist of Worcester Cathedral, in testimony of their sincere regard and esteem and of their appreciation of his eminent services rendered to the cause of music during a long course of years. Whitsuntide, 1879.

In making the presentation Earl Beauchamp, addressing Mr. Done, said: "It was felt last year that the revival of our Musical Festival to its usual splendour was a fitting opportunity of showing the regard of your fellow-citizens and friends for you as having been so long connected with the Festivals, and it gives me very great pleasure to be the spokesman and representative of those who have subscribed to this testimonial; and knowing as I do the great interest you have always taken in musical matters, I can give my testimony to your personal worth. It is some satisfaction to me to think that you have preserved the traditional character of your Festival music, which has not been the case in some other places; and I sincerely hope that for many long years you may enjoy this testimonial, which I present to you on behalf of your friends and neighbours, and which you have so worthily earned."—Mr. Done, in accepting the testimonial, said: "I can scarcely thank you, my lord, for your kindness. I accept the testimonial with gratitude and thanks. It has always been my study to promote the good cause of music in Worcester; and, if I have failed, it has not been for want of desire. It is a remarkable fact that this honour should have fallen upon me at this particular time, as it is exactly fifty years since I first attended the Festivals of the Three Choirs. My late master, Mr. Clarke (to whom I was then articled), took me to the Hereford Festival as his assistant in 1828, and I have never missed one of the Three Choir Festivals since that time. Of all the Festivals I have ever attended that of last year was the most important, as, had my programme not proved attractive and the Festival had failed, it might have proved fatal to their continuance; and I am very thankful to hear that my friends were satisfied with my efforts. particularly obliged to Mr. Cattley (who has been my friend for more than twenty years), and I can assure you that to the end of my days I shall do my best to continue to merit the approbation of the donors and to further the interests of music in this city.—The Rev. R. Cattley added a few words, expressing the extreme pleasure it had given him to take part in the presentation, and he added that many of the subscribers to the Testimonial Fund had told him that they were non-Festival people. The members of the musical profession in London took up the matter in the warmest manner, and cheerfully contributed to the fund.

The members of the Philharmonic Society at Toronto, Canada, recently presented their Conductor, Mr. Torrington, with a handsome gold-mounted bâton and illuminated address. The presentation was made by Mr. A. S. Nordheimer, President, on behalf of the Society. Mr. Torrington, in reply, referred to the number of concerts given by the Society since September, 1874, at which time he assumed the conductorship. During that period, he said, the following oratorios were performed: "Messiah" (Handel), four times; "Elijah" (Mendelssohn), five times; "St. Paul" (Mendelssohn), twice; "Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn), once; "Creation" (Haydn), three times; "Stabat Mater" (Rossini), three times; "Fridolin" (Randegger), three times; "Lay of the Bell" (Romberg), twice; "May Queen" (Bennett), twice; "Spring's Message" (Gade); part-songs; overtures; piano solos with orchestra; portions of symphonies by Beethoven, Haydn, Schumann, and others. He congratulated the Society upon the harmonious feeling which exists among the members, and also upon having so efficient a committee of management, and worthy President and Treasurer, as well as the financial standing of the Society. In conclusion, he trusted the same interest manifested in the past on the part of members and officers alike would continue for many years, and that the Society would meet with even more earnest support from the public than heretofore.

Miss Zimmermann (from Hamburg) gave her first Evening Concert at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington, on Thursday, May 29, when she was assisted by—Vocalists: Madame Nita Guzman, Misses Laura Grey, and Darnell, Madame Carroli, Miss Clyforde, Mr. Fulkerson, Mr. Ross Browne, and Mr. Prenton; Instrumentalists: Herr Hause and Miss Butler (pianoforte), Herr Otto Booth (violin), and Herr Schuberth (violoncello). Amongst the various items in the programme deserving especial mention were a MS. song, "In the churchyard wander I" (encored), composed expressly for and sung by Miss Zimmermann, and accompanied by the composer, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac.; "Roberto, o tu che adoro" (encored), Madame Nita Guzman; "Bid me discourse," Miss Laura Grey; "Nelson," Mr. Ross Browne; "La Serenata," Miss Zimmermann; and the airs for violin and violoncello, by Herren Booth and Schuberth. Herr Hause and Miss Butler contributed some pianoforte solos, and accompanied in a highly efficient manner. The hall was crowded in every part, and the bénéficiaire may be congratulated upon the great success of her first concert in England.

The united choirs of Mr. George Wells, numbering about 300 voices, gave a Concert at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on Tuesday evening, the 27th of May, to a crowded audience. Haite's Cantata "The Song of the Year" occupied the whole of the first part. The solos were sung by Miss Bessie Webber, Mr. Albert James, and Mr. George Weige; the accompaniments being played by a band under the leadership of Mr. Charles Mason. The choruses were received with great applause, especially "Summer, where hath summer gone," which was much admired and had to be repeated. Mr. James was also encored in "Now the river banks are green." In the second part, which was miscellaneous, Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May" was well sung by Messrs. Harry Clark, Seymour, Garrett, Brady, and Morgan; and "See the chariot at hand" (Horsley), "May morning" (Wells), "English beauty" (Sparks), and "Sweet and low" (Barnby), were all given with much spirit and effect. A word of praise should be given to Miss Rosa Henman, who acquitted herself of the arduous duties of accompanist exceedingly well.

On May 28 an excellent Concert was given in the Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, by the Parish Church Choir, assisted by numerous friends and several professional artists. Mr. Churchwarden A. Bell, who had taken an active part in promoting the concert, prefaced its commencement with apologies for the non-attendance of Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mrs. Burlison, and Mr. Frank Elmore, from indisposition. Part I. opened with an appropriate selection from Haydn's "Seasons," viz., "Spring," in which the solos were taken by Miss Spiller, Mr. A. Smith, and Mr. T. J. Grylls. This selection went very well throughout, the soloists being thoroughly satisfactory and the choruses being rendered with good effect by the choir boys and a strong company of ladies and gentlemen. Barnby's song, "When the tide comes in," was given by Miss Webb, R.A.M., who was deservedly applauded, as was also Miss Spiller for her singing of "She wandered down the mountain side," which was substituted for Gounod's "Ave Maria." Several other pieces of much interest, both vocal and instrumental, were included in the programme; and the concert, in spite of the many disappointments, was highly successful.

At a meeting of the Committee of the Bristol Musical Festival, held on the 12th ult., the leading features of the programme for the approaching Festival were definitely settled. The Festival will consist of four morning performances and three evening concerts, and will be held in the Colston Hall, as usual. On Tuesday morning, October 14, the Festival will open with Handel's "Samson," to be followed on Wednesday morning by Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on Thursday by Mozart's "Requiem" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," closing as usual on Friday morning with Handel's "Messiah." Each of the three evening concerts on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday will include at least one entire work of the great masters and a miscellaneous selection. Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis-Night" and his "Hear my Prayer," with solo by Madame Albani, will be included in the scheme; and of compositions new to Bristol, Brahms's Cantata "Rinaldo," for tenor solo (Mr. Edward Lloyd) and chorus of male voices, and Beethoven's Choral Symphony are decided to be given. Mr. Charles Hallé's full orchestra will also be heard for the first time in various works of the modern German school.

We are glad to hear that Her Majesty has granted a pension of £100 a year from the civil list to Mr. Henry Smart in consideration of his eminent services to musical art. Mr. Smart has been so long before the public as a composer that it would be impossible here to enumerate one-half of the many works which he has given to the world; but we may mention his charming Cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron," which seems rapidly growing in public estimation, "King René's Daughter," "The Fisher Maidens," and also his numerous organ compositions and contributions to Church music, prominent amongst which should be named his popular Service in F. Unfortunately the pleasure we feel at the governmental recognition of Mr. Smart's talents is clouded by the knowledge that he is now lying dangerously ill, and that but slender hope is entertained of his recovery. We need scarcely say that in our earnest wishes for his convalescence we are joined by all who can estimate a true artist and a conscientious gentleman.

A Festival in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund is to be given in Bath on September 30 and October 1 next. The proceedings will commence with a Choral Service on the morning of the first day in the Abbey Church, by permission of the rector, the Rev. Canon Brooke, on which occasion the sermon will be preached by the Bishop of Bath and Wells. This will be followed in the evening by a Concert in the Assembly Rooms. On the following day the Service will be held in the afternoon, when the Rev. R. J. Meade, Canon of Wells Cathedral, will preach. A Concert will again be given in the evening, when it is probable that a performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" will form an important item in the programme. Several influential gentlemen in the neighbourhood have given their names as honorary secretaries to the Festival, and will work with the Local Secretary of the Fund, Mr. J. Gleaves, in carrying out the general arrangements.

HERR MAX LAISTNER, from Stuttgart, gave a Pianoforte Recital at St. George's Hall, Langham Place, on the 12th ult. The programme comprised Bach-Liszt's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata, Schumann's Carnival, and three pieces each by Chopin and Liszt. Of this by no means easy task Herr Laistner acquitted himself well, both technically and musically, the highly poetical rendering of Schumann's Carnival being especially worthy of mention. Herr Laistner is a welcome addition to our London pianists, and we hope to hear him soon at one of our larger musical institutes. Frl. Friedländer (who replaced Frl. Hohenschild, absent from indisposition) sang several songs by Schubert, Schumann, Jadassohn, and others, and was highly appreciated. She was well accompanied by Herr Carl Weber.

A NEW comic Opera, entitled "Daisy Dingle," was successfully produced by the Leytonstone Amateur Opera and Comedy Company at a private performance given at the Grosvenor Hall on Tuesday, May 27, the libretto being the work of Mr. Henry J. Dakin, the music that of Mr. J. H. Maunder. The four characters, John Peablossom, Polly Peablossom, Daisy Dingle, and Adolphus Hairdye, were capitally performed by Mr. Henry Baker, Miss Dakin, Miss Nellie Dakin, and Mr. T. P. Frame respectively, and the chorus consisted of about thirty voices, chiefly members of the Grosvenor Choral Society. Mr. J. H. Maunder presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Frank Mead at the harmonium. Mr. Henry J. Dakin officiated as stage-manager, and Mr. Henry Baker as musical director.

MR. GADSBY'S Cantata "The Lord of the Isles" was given by the University of Dublin Choral Society, on the 18th ult., with marked success; and too much praise cannot be awarded to Sir Robert Stewart, the Director of the Society, for his earnestness in bringing forward compositions which, although cordially received on their production, are too often allowed to remain without even a second hearing. The composer of this Cantata is already known to fame by his music to "Alcestis," and also by several orchestral works; and, if we may judge by the manner in which his "Lord of the Isles" was received by a Dublin audience, there can be little doubt that, when generally known, the work will considerably add to his reputation.

WE regret to announce the death of Miss Frances Ridley Havergal, the gifted authoress of the well-known hymns "Thy life was given for me," "Thou art coming, O my Saviour," "I could not do without Thee," and of some beautiful poems called "Under the Surface," containing a graphic description of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata. She was also the author of a volume called "Sacred Songs for Little Singers," which have been set to music by Signor Randegger. Miss Havergal, who was the youngest daughter of the late Rev. W. H. Havergal, the musical composer and Canon of Worcester, died at her residence, Caswell Bay, near Swansea, on the 3rd ult., aged 42, after short and acute suffering.

A SPECIAL Musical Service was held on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult., at Christ Church, Clapham (of which Mr. Richard Lemaire is Organist and Director of the Choir), when Mr. Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was performed, under the direction of the composer. The Choir numbered forty voices, and the work was admirably given—some of the numbers being particularly well rendered—viz., the alto and bass solos, and the chorus, "Oft in danger." The very fine organ was played by Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, in addition to which a good effect was obtained by the introduction of a piano, played by Mr. Lemaire, and a cornet.

THE Saturday evening series of Operas in English at the Alexandra Palace during the past month have included "Cinderella," "Satanella," "Fra Diavolo," and "La Traviata." The second grand Italian Opera Concert took place on the 14th ult., when Mdlles. Thalberg, Louisa Pyk, Belocca, Turolla, Mesdames Scalchi and Smeroschi, M. Capoul, Signori Vidal, Corsi, Silvestri, and Graziani appeared. The programme was composed of well-known operatic selections, and included the Overtures "Leonora" (No. 3), and "Der Freischütz," and March from Gounod's "Romeo e Giulietta." Open-air Concerts in the Grove have been given each Wednesday evening, and Ballad Concerts in the Central Hall each Thursday evening.

AN Evening Concert was given in Bloomsbury Chapel Lecture Hall on Thursday, the 5th ult., under the direction of Mr. George Carr, assisted by the Messrs. Le Jeune, who performed on what they term their drawing-room orchestra (consisting of a grand piano, large harmonium, first and second violins and violoncello); and the admirable precision and effect given to excerpts from operas, overtures, &c., excited the hearty applause of a large and appreciative audience. The instrumental portions of the concert were interspersed with songs by Miss Jessie Williams, Miss Harris, Mr. W. Monk, and Mr. G. Gardner Leader.

A CAPITAL performance of Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea" was given by the Grosvenor Choral Society, at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday, the 20th ult., with full band and chorus, the solos being sung by Miss De Vallence and Mr. T. P. Frame. The second part of the Concert consisted of part-songs, &c., given with excellent effect by the choir. An encore was awarded to a most artistic rendering of Millard's "Waiting," by Miss De Vallence; Mr. Arthur Weston receiving a similar compliment for his singing of "Good-bye, sweetheart." The Concert was a great success, and reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Henry Baker.

WE have received the most eulogistic criticisms upon Mr. Franz Rummel's playing in America, and much regret that space will not allow of our transferring a portion of them to our columns. His classical Pianoforte Recitals in New York have evidently been a prominent feature in the concert season; his performance of the works of Beethoven, Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, &c., being spoken of with equal commendation. We do not know whether he intends to remain in the States; but can scarcely doubt that, should he feel inclined to pay London a visit, his merits would be promptly and cordially recognised.

ON Trinity Sunday morning an extremely effective service took place at the Church of All Saints', Finchley Road, in aid of the Organ Fund. Smart's Te Deum in F, Sullivan's Jubilate in D, and an adaptation of the Kyrie and Gloria from Mozart's "Twelfth Mass," were well rendered by the choir, the organ accompaniment being supplemented by flute, cornet, trombone and tympani. The service was conducted by Stroud L. Cocks, Esq., Precentor, whose efforts for the improvement of the music at this church are highly appreciated. Mr. W. Biggs, the Organist, accompanied with admirable taste.

WE much regret to announce that the popular actress and vocalist, Mrs. Howard Paul, expired at her residence, 17, The Avenue, Bedford Park, Turnham Green, on the 6th ult. Since her first appearance on the stage at the Strand as Miss Isabella Featherstone, in the character of Captain Macheath, March, 1853, her vocal and dramatic ability has been displayed at most of the metropolitan theatres. Mrs. Howard Paul's latest appearance in London was at the Opéra-Comique last year, when she sustained the part of Lady Sangazure in the comic Opera of "The Sorcerer."

THE North London Philharmonic Society's fourth and final Concert of the season was given at the Athenæum, Camden Road, N., on Monday evening the 23rd ult., and attracted a large audience. The programme included six part-songs by the choir, and solos by Miss Agnes Larkcom, R.A.M., Miss Amy Dicksee, L.A.M., Mr. J. F. Probert, and others. Mr. A. A. Yeatman, accompanist to the Society, and the Conductor, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, each contributed pianoforte solos. The Society propose to commence their third season in October next.

THE Southwark Choral Society gave a Concert at the Vowler Street School-rooms, Walworth, on May 27, the principal feature in the programme being Mr. Francis Howell's Cantata "The Song of the Months," which made a highly favourable impression upon the audience. All the choruses were admirably sung by the choir; and the solos were ably rendered by Mrs. Underwood, Miss Dear, Miss Barfield, Mrs. Watt, Messrs. Bunker, Palmer, Sleat, and Watt. Mr. W. H. Harper presided at the harmonium, and Mr. G. F. Smith, jun., at the pianoforte.

MISS FLORENCE WYDFORD gave an Evening Concert on Thursday evening, May 29, at the Masonic Hall, Camberwell New Road. The principal vocalists, besides the bénéficiaire, were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Josephine Pulham, Miss Louie Wood, Mr. J. H. Pearson, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Miss Wydford elicited encores for "The chorister," "The old, old story," and "Caller herrin'." The Concert was an artistic success. Miss Bessie M. Waugh rendered efficient service at the piano; and Mr. Alfred J. Eyre is deserving of a word of praise for his conductorship.

THE Festival Service of the London Church Choir Association took place in Westminster Abbey on Saturday afternoon, the 7th ult., in the presence of a large congregation. The choristers numbered over 200, and were drawn from the fifty choirs of which the Association consists. Mr. J. Robertson Murray, the honorary choirmaster, conducted, and Dr. Bridge presided at the organ. The sermon was preached by the Dean of Westminster, who took as his text the words, "I will not leave you comfortless" (St. John xiv. 18).

MR. JOHN FARMER'S popular Oratorio for children, "Christ and His Soldiers," will be performed at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 5th inst., with Miss José Sherrington, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Arthur Hooper, and Mr. Thurley Beale as principal vocalists, and a band and chorus of 350 performers. The Oratorio will be preceded by "The Pageant Music," or Serenade for full orchestra, written by the same composer for the opening of the Art Museum at Nottingham.

MRS. BUCKNALL-EYRE gave an Evening Concert at the Royal Academy of Music on the 24th ult., which was well attended by a highly appreciative audience. The bénéficiaire (formerly Miss Bucknall) has already made her fame before the public as an accomplished pianist; and on the present occasion her performance elicited the warmest marks of approbation, the programme being carefully selected to display her power of rendering compositions of various styles. Mr. Alfred J. Eyre was an able Conductor.

THE following gentlemen will act as examiners at the forthcoming Higher Musical Examinations at Trinity College, London: Philip Armes, Mus. D., Organist of Durham Cathedral; J. Barnby, Precentor of Eton; E. T. Chipp, Mus. D., Organist of Ely Cathedral; Henry Gadsby, G. M. Garrett, M.A., Mus. D., Cambridge University; E. J. Hopkins, Organist of the Temple; Henry Smart, and Edward Silas.

THE South Kensington Ladies' Choir, under the direction of Mrs. Arthur O'Leary, gave a performance of Reinecke's "Snowdrop" at Emperor's Gate, on the 18th ult., by permission of Mrs. W. Conway Morgan. Miss Halliwell's soprano solos were much admired by a critical audience, and Miss F. Elliott recited the connecting verses with great effect. Miss S. Morgan also performed Mendelssohn's "Presto Scherzando" in a brilliant manner.

MISS ANNIE STOCKEN gave a Concert at the Langham Hall, Great Portland Street, on the 17th ult., when she was assisted by Signor Ferrani (vocalist), Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (violin), Signor Pezze (violoncello), and Miss M. G. Carmichael (pianoforte). The programme, which included Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, Mozart's Trio in E major, and other well-known works, gave much satisfaction to a numerous audience.

A PERFORMANCE of Handel's "Messiah" was given on Thursday, May 29, at Craven Chapel, Regent Street, in aid of the renovation fund of the building. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Dones, Mr. H. Seligmann, and Mr. Miles. The choir numbered 150 voices. Mr. Norman Carr presided at the organ, and Mr. George Carr conducted.

AT Madame Sainton-Dolby's Pupils' Concert at Steinway Hall on the 17th ult., her new Cantata, "The Story of the Faithful Soul," was produced for the first time. Miss Vernon (in place of Miss Arthur, who was indisposed) and Mr. Faulkner Leigh were the soloists, Mr. Leopold presided at the pianoforte, and M. Sainton conducted. The performance was very successful.

AN excellent Chamber Concert was given by Mr. Charles Gardner at Willis's Rooms on the 9th ult., the principal feature in which was the pianoforte performance of Mr. Gardner, whose talent and versatility were successfully manifested in a well-selected programme. The refined and artistic playing of Mrs. Lamborn Cock was also the theme of general admiration.

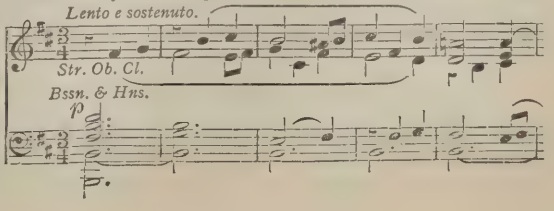
WE regret to announce the death of Mr. W. Pinney, sen., of Exeter, which took place on the 18th ult. Deceased was well-known and respected in the musical profession, having resided in the above city upwards of fifty years, during which time his name has been associated with nearly all the principal musical events of the neighbourhood.

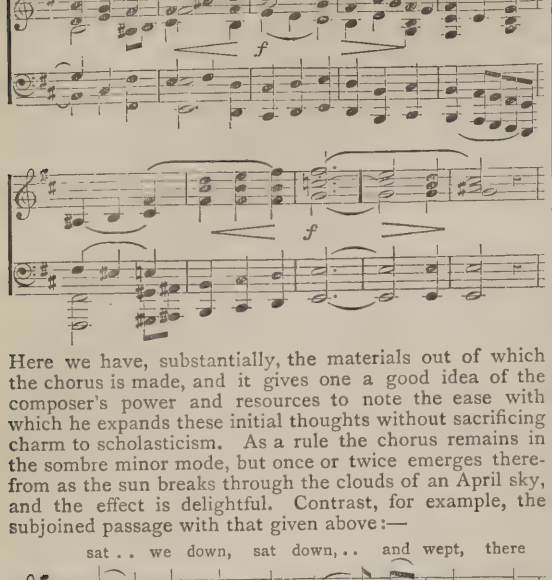
REVIEWS.

By the Waters of Babylon (Psalm 137). For Soprano Solo, Chorus, and Orchestra. Composed by Hermann Goetz (Op. 14. Posthumous works, No. 1).
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

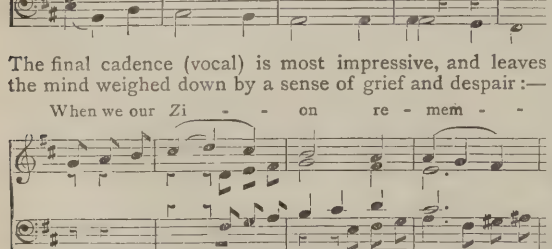
TILL the life of Hermann Goetz is written by some one to whom all its details are known, we cannot possibly tell when, where, and under what circumstances his various, but, alas! too few, works were composed. Regarding the Psalm before us no more is known than appears on the title-page, and from that we learn that it is nearly the last of his productions—assuming that all have now been published—and that, like many others, it remained in manuscript at his untimely, and, for art, unfortunate death. The Psalm has a special value since, so far as we are yet aware, it is the only example of Goetz's pretensions as a writer of sacred music. Few though his compositions were, he tried to cover all the ground of art, and thus could not long remain working in any particular portion. He gave the world but one symphony, one secular cantata, one string quartett, one pianoforte sonata, one pianoforte trio, and, now, one religious hymn. Excellent in every department, he seems to have been qualified to shine most in the one last named. The nature and genius of Goetz was obviously solid and serious; and this, by the way, accounts for the fact that even his comic opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," is far more grave than sportive. Having such a temperament and manner, we may well believe of him that, had he lived, he would have worked zealously and successfully amid the solemnities of religion. This thought the Psalm now under notice well bears out. Looking upon its pages we cannot resist an idea that the composer wrote them con amore, feeling himself, so to speak, called to the work, and qualified for its performance by the Power that not only "shapes our ends" but adapts us to their fulfilment. Looking at the publication of the Psalm by an English firm, as well as at that of the Cantata "Nœnia," we cannot resist another feeling—one of pride in the fact that, albeit Goetz was not known amongst us a year ago, we have discovered his excellence in the interim and produced nearly every important available work from his pen. Never before was such rapidity and thoroughness of acceptance known, and the fact speaks well, not only for the composer who could so commend himself, but for the public taste which could so discern a stranger's worth.

A first glance at Goetz's setting of "By the Waters of Babylon" shows that the young master approached his subject with a resolve to treat it, not trickily and showily, with a display of cheap and flimsy sentiment, but with the gravity of which, to its credit, German sacred music presents so many illustrious examples. Here the scholar as well as the man of pious feeling speaks, and we recognise at once that learning is combined with devotion in the making of a perfect offering. The work opens with a chorus in B minor (Lento e sostenuto), preceded by a few bars of orchestral introduction, which we are induced to quote because they are an epitome of that which follows:—

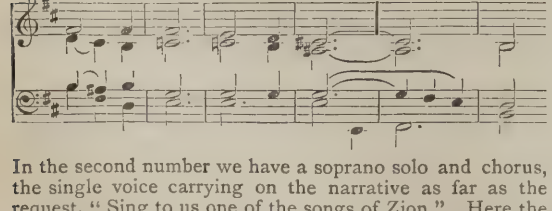




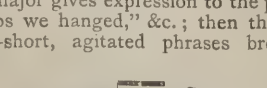
Here we have, substantially, the materials out of which the chorus is made, and it gives one a good idea of the composer's power and resources to note the ease with which he expands these initial thoughts without sacrificing charm to scholasticism. As a rule the chorus remains in the sombre minor mode, but once or twice emerges therefrom as the sun breaks through the clouds of an April sky, and the effect is delightful. Contrast, for example, the subjoined passage with that given above:—



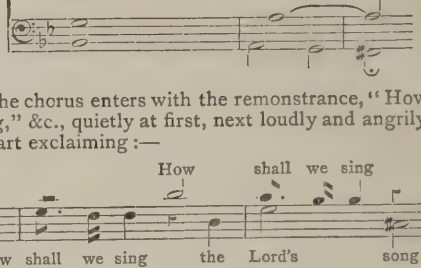
The final cadence (vocal) is most impressive, and leaves the mind weighed down by a sense of grief and despair:—



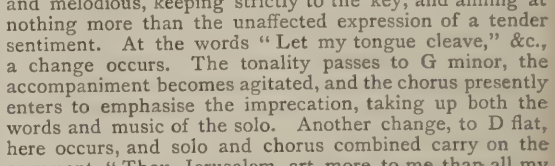
In the second number we have a soprano solo and chorus, the single voice carrying on the narrative as far as the request, "Sing to us one of the songs of Zion." Here the composer shows consummate skill. A sad and simple passage in D major gives expression to the pathetic words, "And our harps we hanged," &c.; then the key changes to G minor—short, agitated phrases break from the orchestra:—



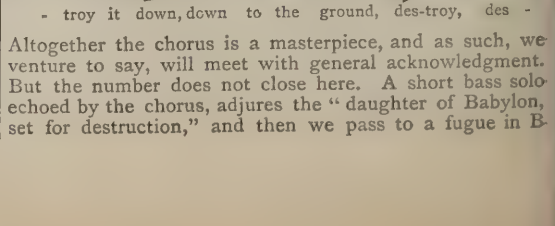
as the insulting demand for a song is referred to, and the actual words of the captor to the captives are set with an easy confidence, almost a jauntiness, admirably expressive. But the best point follows. Goetz makes the solo voice repeat "softly, as if aside," and as though stricken with shame and pain, the words "A song of Zion!" passing to them and to the subjoined music from the dominant seventh of D:—



Then the chorus enters with the remonstrance, "How shall we sing," &c., quietly at first, next loudly and angrily, part after part exclaiming:—



This section—not a prolonged one—comes to a full close in D major, leading without a break to an air with chorus (same key), "If I think not on thee, Jerusalem." The leading division of the solo (Lento) is smoothly flowing and melodious, keeping strictly to the key, and aiming at nothing more than the unaffected expression of a tender sentiment. At the words "Let my tongue cleave," &c., a change occurs. The tonality passes to G minor, the accompaniment becomes agitated, and the chorus presently enters to emphasise the imprecation, taking up both the words and music of the solo. Another change, to D flat, here occurs, and solo and chorus combined carry on the argument, "Thou, Jerusalem, art more to me than all my joy." So, through various episodes of interest, which cannot be pointed out for lack of space, the number passes, till, with delightful effect, the tranquil first solo re-enters and brings it to a conclusion. Throughout this portion of the work Goetz's dramatic powers are strongly in evidence, and, not less, the art with which, while not sacrificing truth of expression, a resourceful composer can obtain contrast and variety. At the close of the solo an orchestral passage leads to the key of E minor and to a chorus (No. 4), "Lord, remember the children of Edom"—perhaps the most expressive, as it certainly is the most dramatic, in the work. The orchestra leads off with a vigorous unison for basses:—



And in this we see at a glance the character of the accompaniment. Nearly throughout the basses are thus wrathfully thundering beneath the voices of the chorus, which move now in massive harmony, now in energetic passages of imitation. At one point a most striking result is produced by making the male voices repeat the words of the Edomites, "Destroy it, yea, down to the ground," while the sopranos and contraltos exclaim "Remember":—

Altogether the chorus is a masterpiece, and as such, we venture to say, will meet with general acknowledgment. But the number does not close here. A short bass solo echoed by the chorus, adjures the "daughter of Babylon, set for destruction," and then we pass to a fugue in B minor, on the following subject, announced by the tenors with a counterpoint for orchestral basses:—

The fugue is worked out at some length, and with sustained energy, but no elaboration of device; ending at last (in the key of E minor) on a chord of the sixth. Then the adjuration, "Daughter of Jerusalem," &c., is chorally repeated, coming to a pause on the dominant of the original key (B minor), and being followed by a repetition of the subject and words of the first chorus. The passage shown in the third quotation above actually ends the work, and rounds it off with a return to the sentiment and expression with which it began.

In the foregoing remarks a mere outline of the Psalm has been attempted, but this may serve to obtain for Goetz's music the attention so powerful an example deserves.

Counterpoint. A Practical Course of Study. By G. A. Macfarren, Mus. Doc., M.A., Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.

[Cambridge: at the University Press.]

IT is by no means to be wondered at that in the present day, when it is considered by some composers rather a merit than a fault to ignore many of the time-honoured canons of art, the study of Counterpoint should be occasionally spoken of somewhat slightingly, and that even good musicians should boldly assert that as the majority of the rules are founded upon obsolete scales, they can have but little weight when applied to modern music. That there is some reason in this objection we freely admit; but surely the course of training which has formed our strongest and healthiest artists is not to be thrown aside because some modification of its principles is necessary to adapt it to the requirements of the time in which we live. In fact, the more we examine most of the laws given forth by the old contrapuntists the more are we wonderstruck at the soundness of the principles which they demonstrate; and the utmost we can do is, by the light of our modern tonal system, to find out and teach the causes for the effects which were discovered at a time when note was written against note without relation to the generation of the chords produced by such combinations. It can scarcely be supposed that Professor Macfarren—who brings not only accurate musical knowledge, but a large amount of experience in teaching to his task—should be unmindful of the necessity of writing for the students of his own day; and we are therefore by no means surprised when, on taking up his book, we find that he attempts to "systematise the appropriation of contrapuntal principles to the phraseology, or idiom, of melodic and harmonic figures now in use." This object, avowed in his preface, is steadily kept in view throughout the work; and whenever, therefore, any of the old laws are departed from, sufficient reason is given for such departure. Considering how persistently we have laboured in the pages of this journal to sever the connection between a major key and its, so-called, "relative" minor, it is satisfactory to find that Professor Macfarren speaks thus decisively upon the subject: "The long-established inaccurate signature of the minor form of a key is a remnant of the Modal system, wherein all the Modes have the same signature, though every one may be transposed higher or lower with altered signature to adjust the position of tones and semi-tones. This system for ages held back the progress of music, by obscuring, if not totally hiding, the natural principles on which music is based, and which constitute the science that furnishes the materials wherewith the artist works." Following out his theory, the author of this work logically cautions students against modulating, in exercises, from any key to another with the same signature.

The only departure in this book from the usual plan of teaching Counterpoint is that of working each species in two, three, four, and even in five parts before proceeding to the next species. This may or may not be advisable; but, being the result of many years of acute observation on the results of each method, it is at least entitled to respect. The rules relating to the progression of parts which precede the chapter on the first species of Counterpoint will, if carefully studied, materially lighten the work of the young contrapuntist; for they give good and substantial reasons for laws which are too often merely drily laid down. We have before spoken of the manner in which the old masters groped in the dark, and often discovered an effect when the cause was hidden; and no better instance perhaps can be cited than the use of the inversion (upon the supertonic) of the diminished triad, at the final cadence, even in preference to the common chord of the dominant; the truth being—as Professor Macfarren says—that there was an "instinctive desire for the dominant discord when rule precluded its use." An important feature in this book is the plan of figuring either the written or implied harmony, which of course cuts at the very root of the time-honoured method of writing note after note irrespective of the connection of chords. Here, indeed, a new light is thrown upon our labours, and hard contrapuntal rules, even rigidly observed, may now lead us astray. Professor Macfarren meets this difficulty thus: "Sometimes a note," he says, "may be concordant with that of the subject, but discordant against the complete chord which is implied, if not represented, in the other parts. Then it is to all effect a passing-note, and must be treated as such." If, for example, in the second species in two parts, a fifth changes to a sixth and then skips, the old laws of Counterpoint are not infringed, but a change of harmony is indicated, and it is truly said that "the object of this species is to teach the writing of two notes against one chord, whereas the example shows two chords against one note." Again, if our modern tonal system rejects the connection of the supertonic triad with that of the tonic at the final cadence, how can we reconcile to ourselves the progression 5, 6, on the supertonic for the penultimate bar? And yet this cadence is often given to us as one of the best that can be used. After all the species of Counterpoint have been fully explained, some very good examples are given of the different species combined, and the student is recommended to make himself thoroughly conversant with the various methods by which this may be effected.

We are glad to find that the explanations and examples of Double Counterpoint are limited to that in the 8th, the 10th, and the 12th, for the others are but rarely used, and can be readily mastered, if desired, by those familiar with the three here given. The temptation, as we have already hinted, is very great, when writing according to the light of our own day, to look upon the old contrapuntal laws as unsuited for modern music; but we have here seen that a composer of the present time accepts these laws without reserve, save where a slight relaxation of their stringency is proved to be desirable. In his chapter on "Counterpoint in the Modern Free Style," however, he fully shows us how those who wish to escape from their fetters may have full liberty to do so when they have duly served their apprenticeship; for, as he truly says, "the rules of counterpoint were established prior to the discovery of the natural principles whereon modern harmony and the phraseology that springs from it are based." In this section of his work the author demonstrates the fact that, under certain restrictions, chords are available in their second inversion, passing-notes can be approached by leap, and even fundamental discords and the entire chromatic genus can be used. This accurate division between the ancient—strict—style and the modern—free—style has invariably been rigidly observed in all the works contributed by Professor Macfarren to the science of which he is so consummate a master; and certainly, when applied to the subject of counterpoint, it clears away many of the difficulties encountered by those teachers who, whilst willing to cling to the old traditions, instinctively feel that much of our modern practice is opposed to them. Not only, therefore, for the large amount of knowledge displayed, and the clear manner in which this knowledge is conveyed to others, but as furnishing incontestable proof that the laws of counterpoint are in their full signification applicable to all ages, do we welcome this elaborate work by one whose zeal in the cause to which he has devoted his life, in addition to his exceptional talents, have placed him in that proud position which he still does so much to ennoble.

Te Deum and Jubilate in D. By Henry Purcell. Edited by George C. Martin.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In the very interesting chapter on Purcell in his "Musical History," the late George Hogarth informs us, on the authority of Dr. Burney, that the work now under notice was written for St. Cecilia's Day, 1694. From the same source we learn that "it was constantly performed at St. Paul's Cathedral on the Feast of the Sons of the Clergy from the death of the author in 1695 till the year 1713, when Handel's 'Te Deum' for the peace of Utrecht was produced by order of Queen Anne. From this time they seem to have been performed alternately till 1743, when Handel composed his magnificent 'Te Deum' for the Battle of Dettingen. From that time Purcell's 'Te Deum' has been very seldom used; a circumstance to be regretted but not to be wondered at, as the stupendous 'Dettingen Te Deum' has thrown into the shade all former compositions of that nature."

The above quotation furnishes all the information we have been able to obtain relative to the history and composition of one of Purcell's greatest and most interesting sacred works. It is impossible to read through the present, or indeed any of Purcell's more important compositions, without feeling that by his premature death England lost the greatest musical genius that this country has yet produced. In making this somewhat broad statement account must of course be taken of the period at which he lived—that of the Restoration. It would be obviously unjust to apply to his music the same standard of measurement which we should use with a composer of the nineteenth, or even of the latter part of the eighteenth century. We must remember that Handel and Bach were but ten years old when Purcell died, that Haydn was not born till thirty-seven, and Mozart till sixty-one years later; and that music as an art was almost in its infancy. Hence in Purcell we must be prepared to find much that is in the spirit of a bygone age, especially as regards old-fashioned passages for the voice and primitive treatment of the orchestra. But, after making every allowance for these points, what a wealth of beauty remains to us; what grandeur in the choral writing, what grace and tenderness in much of the melody, and, above all, what boldness in the harmonic progressions! Purcell's choruses frequently seem like an anticipation of Handel's; indeed, it is more than probable that the composer of the "Messiah," who was by no means scrupulous in taking other men's ideas, was indebted for more than one "happy thought" to his illustrious predecessor.

One of the most striking features of the "Te Deum" is its conciseness of form. It consists of fourteen short movements, which together fill only thirty-three octavo pages. Nearly every verse of the hymn is treated as a separate movement; and the whole work, while unity of spirit is maintained throughout, suffers somewhat from want of continuity; as compared with the larger forms to which we are accustomed in the present day, the music appears fragmentary. This is one of the points on which allowance must be made for the period at which the work was composed. It would take us too far, and would probably not be very interesting, to go number by number through the entire work; we shall content ourselves now with touching on the more salient points.

The opening trio and chorus, "We praise Thee, O God," arrests the hearer's attention at once; its breadth and massiveness are worthy of Handel. The triple suspension in the ninth bar of the opening symphony may be cited as an instance of the boldness of harmony referred to above; while the sustained tonic for six bars on the first entry of the voices, both soli and chorus, is another point worthy of mention, as also is the finely developed and closely written fugato on the words "the Father everlasting." In the following movement the interjections by the chorus of the word "Holy" in the middle of the duet for two trebles, "To Thee, cherubin," remind us of Handel's similar treatment of the passage in his "Chandos Te Deum;" while, near the close of the number, we meet with a curious piece of word-painting—"Heaven" being given to the high notes of trebles, altos, and tenors, while the next words, "and earth" are sung by basses alone, descending from D to the lower A. Passing over the three following movements, which are of less interest, we come to a very short but excellently written double fugue on "Thou art the King of Glory," which, again, has much affinity with the style of Handel. Among other parts of the work which attract notice are especially the chorus "Day by day," which certainly furnished more than one hint to Handel; the expressive tenor solo "Vouchsafe, O Lord," and the final chorus "O Lord, in Thee have I trusted," the chief subject of which Handel took bodily for the corresponding movement of the "Dettingen Te Deum," merely changing it from common into triple time.

The "Jubilate," which is in five movements, presents the same general features as the "Te Deum." Here, also, the choral portions are the most interesting and the most important. The opening number is an alto solo and chorus, with an effective though old-fashioned trumpet solo, in Handel's manner. The ejaculatory phrases for the chorus, interspersed between the passages for the solo voice, are very telling. The duet for two tenors which follows, "Be ye sure that the Lord He is God," consists chiefly of passages of imitation for the two voices, and leads to the chorus "O go your way," a short but beautifully neat canon "four in one," carried on with the utmost strictness, yet with the greatest clearness of effect for thirty-two bars. This little movement is a model of scientific writing. The duet for alto and bass, "For the Lord is gracious" is less interesting, but the final chorus "Glory be to the Father," the longest and most important number of the whole, is a worthy crown to a great work. The closeness and clearness of the fugal writing, especially at the "Amen" (pp. 53, 54), are truly admirable, and the effect of the whole is one which for grandeur may compare with any work in the whole range of our English Church music.

It only remains to add that the present edition has been carefully edited and the accompaniment written by Mr. George Martin; and that as the work is of only very moderate difficulty, it may be warmly recommended to the notice of amateur choral societies.

Andante and Rondo Brillante in A flat, for Pianoforte (with orchestral accompaniments ad libitum). Composed, and dedicated to the Philharmonic Society, Liverpool, by Sir Julius Benedict. [Goodwin and Tabb.]

The first movement of this piece is scarcely sufficiently developed to enable it to rank above an appropriate short introduction to the Rondo; but it is charmingly written for the instrument, and the passages are extremely melodious and refined. We cannot see, however, why, being in A flat minor, it should not have the seven flats required for its signature, instead of the four representing the tonic major. The subject of the Rondo is animated; and the movement, without being unduly difficult, is brilliant and effective. It is directed that the small notes should be played when the piece is performed without accompaniments; but the orchestra seems to be wanted to realise fully the intention of the composer.

Soirée Musicale (Biblioteca Musicale lirica. Serie prima. Vol. 2.)
La Regata Veneziana.
Musica di Gioacchino Rossini.
[Ricordi.]

These beautiful little editions of some of the gems of Rossini's chamber vocal pieces will, we hope, command an extensive sale; for, with few exceptions, they are not as well known in this country as they ought to be. Out of the eight airs in the "Biblioteca Musicale lirica" we cannot cite one which is not instinct with the genius of the composer. No. 1, "La Promessa," has a charming subject, a peculiar rhythmical effect being gained by the occasional movement of three crotchets in six-eight time against two triplets in the accompaniment. The Bolero, "L'Invito," the Barcarola, "La Gita in Gondola," and the Tarantella, "La Danza," are also highly attractive; and vocalists should lose no time in making themselves acquainted with such veritable treasures, the last-named of which is the only one that can really be termed "popular." The melodious and highly characteristic three Canzonets in the "Regata Veneziana" will well repay the study they demand. They are all published in the Venetian dialect, with an Italian interpretation; and if sung with the original words, will doubtless prove additionally interesting. The illustrated cover of the "Regata Veneziana" is exceedingly well executed in colours; and the price at which these editions is issued to the public will enable the many to avail themselves of this valuable artistic offering.

The Tambourine Player. Song. Words by Dr. Charles Mackay. Music by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS spirited and characteristic setting of Dr. Mackay's words is fully worthy the reputation of a composer who has already given us so many sterling vocal pieces. A melodious subject, in A minor, appropriately expresses the simple poetry to which it is wedded; and amongst other notable points, we may mention the use of the minor supertonic of the scale, which is often exceedingly quaint and effective. We predict for this song a wide popularity.

A Broken Toy. Song. Words by W. Clement Southam. Music by J. B. Boucher. [Patey and Willis.]

THERE is much musical feeling in this song, which is simple in the extreme, and indeed aims at little more than mere recitation. Some of the harmonies, however, require revision. For instance, we should be puzzled to know the root of the chord G♯, D, E♯, B♭, in the fifth bar of page 2; and we cannot wonder that "the summer swallows cry," since the F in the chord which accompanies them resolves in perfect fifths with the bass. These defects might be easily remedied.

Manda. Fantasia for the Pianoforte. Composed by Carli Zoeller. [Neumeyer and Co.]

THIS Fantasia is exceedingly unpretending in construction, but it is evidently the work of a musician, and may be confidently recommended to amateurs who are not too ambitious. Opening with a placid theme in G minor, which is delicately handled, we come to a subject "più mosso," in the relative major, extremely melodious and attractive. Some changes of key—as, for instance, one into G flat major—give much interest to this movement, which is written throughout with an evident earnestness of purpose, and with no desire to display profundity of learning. These qualifications may not be of the very highest order; but they are rare in these days of self-assertion, and deserve recognition wherever they are met with.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first performance in Italy of Handel's Oratorio "Israel in Egypt," which took place at Rome on the 30th of May last, is an event of more than ordinary interest in the musical world. The Maestro Mustafà, Director of the Società Musicale Romana, to whom the merit belongs of having been the first to introduce "The Messiah" to Italian amateurs, has now rendered a similar service to his countrymen with regard to the great choral masterpiece just named; and to judge by the comments made on the occasion in the Roman press, there can be no doubt that he has found an audience fully prepared to appreciate the noble music of the great representative of musical Protestantism. The work was most carefully rehearsed, and its production was looked forward to with the keenest interest by the musical public, the performance being attended by the élite of the artistic and even the fashionable world. The execution is spoken of as highly finished, the well-trained choir consisting of upwards of 100 singers, and the orchestra numbering sixty performers; the solo portions of the work were rendered by the following artists, viz., Signore Alari and Borghi del Puente (soprano), Ricci de Antonis (alto), Signori Cotogni (tenor), Capelloni and Calzanera (bass). All the Roman journals refer to the event at some length, giving sketches of the composer's career, and expressing the belief that the introduction of Handel's compositions into Italy will mark an epoch in the musical history of the country. As regards the effect produced upon the audience by the performance, the Osservatore Romano remarks as follows: "Every one appeared to be listening with profound attention and reverent wonder to those gigantic choruses, those sweet arias, those imposing fugues with which this classical oratorio of the great German master abounds. At every pause of the performance the universal admiration broke out into long-continued applause, thus doing homage to the celebrated master and bestowing also a well-merited reward upon the Maestro Mustafà, and all those who assisted him in the rendering of the work. Some of the most prominent numbers were redemanded and had to be repeated." The Italian version of the English words is the joint work of Signori Guido Guidi and Girolamo Caldani. There have been several repetitions since the above first performance, each time before numerous audiences, and the interest taken in the work by the public appears as yet unabated.

M. Vaucorbeil, the new director of the Paris Grand-Opéra, has, it is announced, renewed the contracts of Mdlle. Krauss and M. Lasalle with the Paris Opéra, while M. Lamoureux will, notwithstanding rumours to the contrary, retain his post of chef-d'orchestre at that institution. The first operatic work to be produced under the new régime, says the Revue et Gazette Musicale, will be "Le Tribut de Zamora," by M. Gounod. Of the two female rôles existing in the Opera one will be filled by Mdlle. Heilbron, and the other by an artist not yet designated, but which will doubtless be Mdlle. Krauss. M. Maurel will be the baritone. The libretto of the new work is from the pen of MM. Dennery and Brésil, and is founded upon a chapter in the history of Spain when under the Moorish rule.

M. Pasdeloup's efforts to remove the prejudice of Parisian audiences against the music of Herr Wagner have not as yet been crowned with the success which his perseverance deserves. We have already alluded in our last number to the performance, at the last "Concert Populaire" of the season, of the entire first act of "Lohengrin," and the repetition of the performance at the Cirque d'Hiver shortly afterwards. On both occasions the music was on the whole very well received. There was, however, a third performance on May 22, which happened to be the composer's birthday, on which occasion the opponents of his music mustered in full force, and it is admitted by the Paris journals themselves that a disgraceful scene of tumultuous disorder ensued, which made it impossible for the music to obtain a hearing. It has been stated in some quarters that M. Vaucorbeil has the intention of producing "Lohengrin" during the coming season, but in the face of the above fact the statement appears highly improbable.

The Royal Opera of Berlin closed its doors on the 13th ult. for the annual vacation, and will not resume its performances until the 15th proximo. Most of the other German operatic establishments have followed the example.

Among new works to be performed next season at the Berlin Opera are named "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln," by Herr Nessler; and "Die Königin von Saba," by Herr Goldmark. The Imperial Vienna Opera, on the other hand, promises M. Massé's "Paul et Virginie," Hofmann's "Aennchen von Tharau," Ignaz Brüll's "Bianca," and Offenbach's "Les Contes d'Hofmann," for the coming season.

The annual meeting of the Association of German Musicians took place on the 4th ult. at Wiesbaden, extending over four days, during which some interesting compositions obtained a hearing, an enumeration of which will be found among our usual concert programmes.

A meeting will be held next month at Weimar by the delegates of German societies of zither-players.

Recent numbers of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik contain an interesting and exhaustive analysis of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," from the pen of Herr Heinrich Gottwald.

In commemoration of the recent festivities held in connection with the Golden Wedding of their Imperial Majesties of Germany, a so-called "Golden Jubilee Album" has been published by Messrs. Schlesinger, of Berlin, containing a number of musical compositions claiming an historical association with the royal house of Prussia, and in which the name of the Empress Augusta figures as the composer of a March founded upon original Spanish melodies.

Herr Nachbaur, the Munich tenor, and one of the leading interpreters of the rôle of the Knight of the Swan, has, it is reported, accepted an engagement for several months at the Teatro alla Fenice, in Venice, where Wagner's "Lohengrin," is now in course of preparation.

An Opera by August Reissmann, the well-known composer and musical savant, will shortly be brought out at Leipzig. It is entitled "Die Bürgermeisterin von Schorndorf."

The recent performances at Vienna of Herr Wagner's entire Nibelungen-Tetralogy have attracted crowded audiences, and are said to have been in every way successful. The performances were under the direction of Herr Hans Richter.

M. Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, has, at the instigation of the music-publisher Ricordi, of Milan, undertaken the composition of an Opera entitled "Il Macedone," founded upon an episode in the life of Alexander the Great. The same publishing firm has likewise requested the Maestro Luigi Mancinelli, of Rome, to write the music to an operatic text from the pen of Signor Zanardini, entitled "Isora e Rolando."

M. Strakosch, the impresario, has, it is stated, engaged a select company of artists for the coming operatic season in America. Among the vocalists who will form part of the troupe may be mentioned Mdlle. Singer, M. Petrovich (a tenor of great power, who was recently very successful in M. Massenet's Opera, "Le Roi de Lahore," at Bologna and Genoa), Signor Sorti, the gifted baritone, and M. Castelmary. M. Strakosch will commence his campaign at New York in October next, and will terminate it at San Francisco in the following May.

A theatre is being constructed at Sofia, the capital of the newly created principality of Bulgaria and the future residence of Prince Battenberg.

An Opera by the young Maestro Luigi Ricci, entitled "Rienzi," will shortly be brought out at the Teatro alla Fenice at Venice. At Turin a new operatic work by Signor Ferrua, "Un Matrimonio Impossibile," has obtained but little success.

An Opera composed by M. Weckerlin to a libretto written in the Alsatian dialect, and entitled "D'r verhäxt' Herbst," has recently been performed with great success at Colmar. The author of the text-book is a sugar-baker of that town.

Herr W. Tappert, for some years the very able editor of the Berlin Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, has announced his intention to retire from that post.

At Vienna died E. von Schön, much esteemed in Austria as a composer of vocal quartetts. He wrote under the nom de plume of Engelsberg.

Friedrich Haubold, for many years one of the most valued members of the orchestra of the Leipzig Gewandhaus, where he was the leader of the second violins, died on the 12th ult.

Henri Cellot, a pianist and composer of merit, died at Paris at the age of fifty-two.

We have also to announce the death of Friedrich August Kummer, an eminent virtuoso of the violoncello, and able teacher of that instrument. He died at Dresden at the age of eighty-two.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNPREPARED FOURTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In Mr. Parr's interesting article on "Collections of Chants," he says, "this chant has a Fourth to the bass, of which neither of those authors (Drs. Turner and Aldrich) was ever guilty."

The word "guilty" implies the commission of a fault; and I should be glad to learn why it is a fault to write a Fourth to the bass. True, the old masters frequently omitted it; but no one will be bold enough to charge Handel with a fault for having written the 6-4-2 in the last bar but four of the "Amen" Chorus. Surely we are not forbidden to use the second inversion of the common chord: fancy Pelham Humphreys's Chant without it!

We are taught in all works on harmony that it is lawful to use the second and third inversions of the Dominant Seventh; and Albrechtsberger allows the Fourth (Quarta fundata) in free counterpoint.

But some people will have it that if the Fourth be used it must be "prepared": where is this laid down as a hard and fast rule? I have seen tunes, accepted by editors of tune-books, sent back to the composers in order that this naughty progression might be smoothed down; but if I turn to the "Hymnary" I find very numerous examples of the Fourth unprepared, and some of them approached and some quitted "by skip." It is needless to say that these tunes were written by the greatest church composers of this century; and the question naturally arises, did these distinguished writers wilfully infringe some rule which, however, would appear to be somewhat mysteriously occult?

One naturally reads the articles and critiques in THE MUSICAL TIMES as coming ex cathedra, and I, for one, would be very glad of a little enlightenment on the subject of the Unprepared Fourth.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

June 10, 1879. C. E. K.

ORGAN IMPROVEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In answer to Mr. Michell's letter, I may say that I am perfectly well aware of the expense of organ-building.

Notwithstanding Mr. Michell's opinion as to the cost, I still believe the works necessary to the suggested improvement would be well worth the money. Mr. Michell seeks to obtain the effect desired by the very means my suggestion avoids, i.e., independent pipes to each row of keys, and duplication of 8-feet stops. He suggests four 8-feet stops to one 4-feet. Reducing the size of the organ, how would Mr. Michell divide an organ of four stops into two manuals, so as to make each manual complete in itself and the full organ well balanced?

By my suggestion an organ of four stops would be equal in point of effect to one of eight stops, each stop, as I said before, being available independently on both manuals. Of course the power of the organ would not be increased, but the variety, which is what is wanted: no coupler to the keyboard would be necessary, and only one to the pedal.

Sudbury, May 26, 1879. THOMAS ELLISTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Most people are aware that the organ has now almost arrived at a state of perfection—that is, with regard to the mechanism of it. But there is one fault which I think organ-builders and those who have to do with the instrument would do well to try to obviate: it is the rattling of pedals, which is sometimes so very prominent. This is observed more when the organ is on a rood-screen, and especially if there is a soft movement for the hands with a quick one for the feet, without the pedals being coupled, or when there is an uncoupled pedal passage leading into something.

The noise appears to come not actually from the pedals themselves, since they work between two pieces of buff or flannel, but from the combined shakings of the loosely made rods and joints.

I do not know how tolerably thick galvanised wire with neatly made joints would work in place of wood; but I think that by using it there would be little or no ciphering, and the difference of expense not very great.

Of course it would be necessary to have the wire-rods to equal as nearly as possible the weight of wooden ones on account of the pressure.

Yours faithfully,

Edgbaston, June 20, 1879. A. J. BURR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I see in your issue of June 1 a letter entitled "Gas-Engines for Organs," and as I take a great interest in such matters I should like to add to the information contained in your correspondent's letter that the new large organ in Salisbury Cathedral is blown by a gas-engine of Otto's. But for an organ capable of being blown by an engine of one-horse power or less, I should like to recommend another form of engine, which I have most successfully adopted, namely, the "Ryder's Hot-Air Engine." I have a small one of one-third-horse-power in my house for an eight-stop organ, and it answers most admirably. The makers were good enough at my suggestion to adapt a gas-burner, instead of using coke; and all I have to do is to light it twenty minutes before I require it, and then, without the least trouble, it starts work and continues two or three hours without any attention, when it may be necessary to oil the moving parts. Another great advantage consists in the fact that it makes no more noise than a sewing machine. I should add that I burn twenty-five feet of gas per hour, which, at the high price of gas in this town (5s. per 1,000), amounts to just 1½d.

Believe me, yours faithfully,

C. H. FYNES-CLINTON.

Blandford Rectory, Dorset,
June 18, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your last number Mr. Barber, whose interest in organ matters is well known, gives some information on the above subject which will be welcome to many of your readers. The engines however he refers to, though suitable for large instruments, are not readily adaptable for small chamber organs.

Living in a neighbourhood where water-power is not available, I have for some years been desirous of meeting with a gas-engine small enough to supply the wind to an organ of seven or eight sounding stops, and this I am happy to say I have now accomplished, and, during the present month, my arrangements have been satisfactorily completed. The engine was shown at the late Paris Exhibition, is now manufactured in England, and is capable of doing a great deal more work than I require of it.

I shall be happy to give details to any inquirer forwarding me a directed and stamped envelope for reply.

J. W. BILLINGHURST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—You were kind enough to notice my attempt at the restoration of the Pastoral Symphony of Bach to its original balance of tone and qualitative effect by the revival of the now disused oboe di caccia.

It may interest some of your readers to know that it is now possible still more accurately to reproduce the combination of "clang tints" as they were originally planned by the great cantor, by the reintroduction of the oboe d'amore.

It is well known that this instrument differed from the ordinary oboe, just as the clarionet in A does from that in C by standing a minor third lower in pitch. This gives its tone a somewhat more melancholy and pathetic force, approximating to the cor anglais, which is in the F below.

An oboe of this kind has recently been constructed by Mons. C. Mahillon, of Brussels, at the suggestion of Mons. Gevaert, the learned Director of the Conservatoire in that town. I hope shortly to have one of these in my possession, which I shall be happy to show to any person interested in the subject.—Yours,

WILLIAM H. STONE.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—The Choral Union gave a concert in the Music Hall on the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Kirby. The singing of the Union in Stevens's "Cloud-capt towers" and Pinsuti's "In this hour of softened splendour" was excellent, and was much appreciated by the audience. A small string band, led by Herr Ritter, played a Quartett by Haydn, a Gavotte by Herr Ritter, and an Abendlied by Schumann. Herr Ritter played a Romanza by Beethoven (Op. 50), which called forth, as did his own composition, much applause. One or two songs completed the programme.

BARBADOS.—Mr. J. S. Bowen, Organist of St. Ambrose, gave a Concert on Tuesday, May 6, for the benefit of "The Ladies' Kindly Poor Relief Association." The hall was well filled, and the proceeds amounted to nearly fifty pounds. The Concert was opened with a pianoforte duet in which Mr. Gubb, the Organist of the Cathedral, and Mr. Bowen won golden opinions. The vocalist was Miss Skute, whose singing of "Dove sono" was much admired. Miss Philipps gave an artistic rendering of Beethoven's Andante in F, and Mrs. Trowbridge, in Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, met with brilliant success. Hummel's Trio in E flat, for piano and strings, was successfully played by Mrs. Trowbridge (piano), Mr. Clerk (violoncello), and Mr. Doorly, the Organist of St. Leonard's (clarionet substituted for violin).

BIRMINGHAM.—On Tuesday evening, May 27, the members of the Tonic Sol-fa Choral Union performed Handel's Oratorio Semele in the Park Road Chapel, Aston, very successfully. The vocalists were Mrs. Bellamy, Miss Pinder, Miss Baily, and Mrs. Payton; Mr. Bates and Mr. Harrison (from Lichfield Cathedral), Mr. Young and Mr. Fairley. The choruses were specially good, and reflected great credit on Mr. A. Nicholas, the Conductor. Mr. C. W. Perkins presided at the organ, and Mr. A. H. Ridgway at the pianoforte.——The last Concert of Mr. A. J. Sutton's Choir took place in the Masonic Hall on Wednesday, May 28. The programme comprised Weber's Mass in G, a selection from Macfarren's Joseph, Mr. Sutton's Cantata Sage Advice, and a miscellaneous selection of part-songs, solos, and pieces for pianoforte and violin. The vocalists were Mrs. A. J. Sutton, Miss Howle, Miss L. Jeffcoat, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Myers, and Mr. F. H. Smith; Miss Florence Donaldson was the solo violinist. Several lady amateurs took prominent part in the concert, which was most successful, the selection from Joseph being highly appreciated. Mr. Sutton conducted. ——Mr. D. F. Davis's Annual Harp Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday, May 29, the chief attraction being the band of thirty harps. The vocalists were Miss Emma Beasley, Madame Poole, and Mr. Sims Reeves; Mr. Ward played the violin in Gounod's Ave Maria; and Mr. J. Thomas with the concert-giver performed harp solos and a duet. There was an enormous attendance, and the concert was highly successful.——A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in St. Andrew's Church on Thursday, the 5th ult. The principals were Mrs. Bellamy, Miss Bailey, Mr. H. Whiston, and Mr. Pountney; the chorus was augmented by some 100 members of the Philharmonic Union; Mr. Burton accompanied on the organ, and the whole was under the guidance of Dr. Swinnerton Heap.

BRENTWOOD.—On Wednesday afternoon, the 4th ult., a Concert took place in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Case, which was in every way successful. The artists were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Giulia Welmi, Miss Ellen Marchant, Mr. Stedman, Mr. L. Hodges, Mr. Gilbey, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and the Rev. C. Hylton Stewart (vocalists); and Mr. Richard Blagrove (concertina). Among the most noticeable performances were those of Miss Welmi, who has just returned from Italy, and is likely to take a prominent place as a vocalist. Mr. J. W. Case accompanied with taste.

BRISTOL.—The excellent series of Monday Popular Concerts, which have for two seasons been given in the Colston Hall under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, closed most fittingly on May 26 with a benefit concert to the Conductor. At this concert, the choir which Mr. Riseley has formed in connection with his orchestra was heard for the second time in public, when a very satisfactory rendering of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen was given. The principal parts were sustained by Miss Agnese Thorndike, Miss Bailey, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable. In addition to this the band performed Mendelssohn's Overture, Ruy Blas, and Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor; Mr. W. L. Barrett played Glinka's piccolo solo, "Pas des Patineurs;" Mr. and Mrs. Roeckel played a duet for two pianos, "Variations on the March from Weber's Preciosa;" and Mr. John Child sang two songs. Too much praise cannot be given to the able Conductor of these concerts for the manner in which he has carried out the whole of the arrangements for the series.

COVENTRY.—On the 6th ult. the Choir of St. John Baptist Church presented their Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. J. Finch Thorne, with an address, begging his acceptance of a handsome chronometer watch, "as a mark of hearty sympathy with him in the heavy affliction (entire loss of hearing) which has fallen upon him, and as a small memento of the very pleasant connection which has for more than two years existed between their beloved organist and themselves." Previous to Mr. Thorne's departure from Coventry for Tasmania, the Rector of the above-named church, on behalf of himself and some members of the congregation, presented him with a purse of fifty sovereigns "in recognition of his faithful labours as Organist of St. John's, and as a token of deep sympathy with him in the very severe affliction which has befallen him."——The Annual Meeting of the Coventry Musical Society took place on the 11th ult. The report showed that, although three excellent concerts had been given during the past season, the attendances had been scarcely satisfactory; a performance of The Messiah (for which the use of St. Michael's Church had been generously granted by the President), however, having been extremely successful. Mendelssohn's Elijah will probably be included in the programme of next season; and it is hoped that the attraction of this work will materially benefit the funds. After cordial votes of thanks to the honorary officers, and all who had aided the cause of the Society, the meeting separated.

CRAYFORD.—On Thursday, the 19th ult., Miss Louie Nova, R.A.M., gave her second Evening Concert. The vocalists were Miss Louie Nova, Miss Florence Wydford, Mr. H. Gordon, Mr. C. Linda, and Mr. P. Hannant, all of whom were very successful, Miss Nova and Miss Wydford receiving several enthusiastic encores. Mr. Chas. Jury presided at the pianoforte with his usual ability.

HARLINGTON.—The new organ in the church of St. Mary the Virgin was opened on Wednesday afternoon, the 11th ult., when a special service was held. The Vicar, the Rev. G. Johnston, read the prayers, assisted by the Rev. C. E. Haslam. The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. Clarke. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to chants by Dr. E. G. Monk and Purcell; and Psalms 96, 98, and 148 to Beethoven, Elvey, and Battishill. Suitable hymns were selected, and were well sung by the choir, which was augmented by friends from various parts. Mr. Churchill Sibley (Organist of Ampthill Parish Church) presided at the organ, and at the close of the service gave a recital of organ music which was much appreciated by the large congregation. The new instrument, built by Messrs. Trustam, of Bedford, does them great credit; the tone is excellent and the workmanship deserves much praise.

HOPE, MANCHESTER.—The congregation of St. James's recently presented Mr. Lowe with a tea and coffee service, to commemorate the completion of his tenth year as Organist of the church. The various articles are of solid silver of severe pattern, and richly chased, and the teapot bears the following inscripton: "This service is presented to Mr. James Lowe on the completion of ten years' valuable services as Organist of St. James's, Hope, Manchester, as a testimonial of the ability and conscientious care he has bestowed on the church music, and the kindness which has won the regard of his many friends in the congregation. Signed, on behalf of the subscribers, Henry Sayers, M.A., Incumbent of Hope. May, 1879." The adult members of the choir and a few friends were invited to the Parsonage to witness the presentation. About thirty sat down to supper, after which the Rev. H. Sayers, in a complimentary speech, presented the testimonial, and Mr. Lowe having in a few appropriate words returned thanks for the present, the evening was terminated with a selection of vocal music.

HONLEY.—The Annual Festival in connection with St. Mary's Church took place on Whit Sunday, the services throughout being in every way appropriate to the occasion. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. J. Jones, Vicar, that in the afternoon by the Rev. D. Harrison, and that in the evening by the Rev. B. J. Holmes, M.A., Vicar of Christ Church, New Mill. Over 100 of the scholars were trained to assist the choir, and the excellent manner in which everything was rendered was very creditable to those who have laboured so earnestly to make the festival a success. The Proper Psalms were sung to two Anglican single chants, the Magnificat was set to an ancient form of the fifth tone, and the Anthem was "Leave us not, neither forsake us" (Dr. Stainer). Mr. J. C. Beaumont presided at the organ.

INVERNESS.—The Philharmonic Society, which was formed in the early part of this year, gave its first Concert on Friday, 13th ult. Orchestral music is altogether new in this part of Great Britain, and the small band of about twenty performers has been brought, in this short time, to a very creditable degree of efficiency. The chorus numbers about a hundred voices, and the entire force is under the control of Mr. G. H. G. Money, the Organist of the Cathedral. The programme was short, and comprised sacred music only. Among the pieces were Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, and selections from Mozart's "Mass No. 1," the latter with orchestral accompaniment. The instrumental pieces were the overture to the Occasional Oratorio and the "March of Priests" from Mendelssohn's Athalie.

KING WILLIAM'S TOWN, SOUTH AFRICA.—At a complimentary Concert given to Mr. James Hyde, a selection from Haydn's Creation was exceedingly well rendered. The solos were sung by Miss Bainbridge, Mrs. Hampson, the Rev. Page Wood, Mr. Hampson, and Mr. W. R. Ellis. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Mr. G. Whittaker accompanied, and Mr. J. Hyde conducted.

LAUNCESTON.—A large gathering of church choirs (the Launceston District Association), took place in the fine old Parish Church of Launceston on Thursday, the 12th ult., when full choral service was rendered by the united choirs. The service consisted of Processional Hymn, Tallis's Responses for Festal Use, Special Psalms to single Anglican chants by Longhurst, Frost, Armes, and Bradley; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Hopkins, in F; Anthem, "Worthy is the Lamb," Handel. The music was admirably performed, reflecting the greatest credit on all concerned. Mr. Dalby, the Choirmaster, presided at the organ. The Rev. G. Curry intoned the service, and the Rev. J. B. Trentham conducted.

LEWISHAM.—On Monday evening, the 9th ult., a special Musical Service was given at St. Stephen's by a choir of between eighty and ninety voices, composed of members of St. Stephen's and St. Mark's, Lewisham; Christ Church, Lee; St. Paul's, Beckenham; St. Michael's, Cornhill, and others. A capital orchestra of thirty-eight instrumentalists, chiefly members of the Lewisham Orchestral Society, played an overture of Sterndale Bennett's at the commencement of the service, and, as a Prelude, Gounod's "Meditation on Bach's 1st Prelude." In this a pianoforte was used at which Mr. G. E. Blunden presided. Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion was the anthem, and was well rendered by choir and orchestra. Mr. George C. Martin, the sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presided at the organ, and his accompaniments were most judicious. The service concluded with a fine rendering of a hymn to Haydn's tune "Austria," sung by the whole choir and congregation in unison, with special accompaniments for full orchestra scored by the Conductor, Mr. Warwick Jordan, who had every reason to be satisfied with the result of a service which had undoubtedly entailed upon him in its preparation a heavy amount of labour.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. Rea's last Concert of the season was given in the Town Hall, on the 9th ult., with great success. There was a large attendance, and the excellently varied character of the programme afforded the liveliest satisfaction. Mr. Rea performed several organ solos, which were enthusiastically received. The choir sang four numbers from Macfarren's Lady of the Lake, including the coronach, "He is gone," which was redemanded and repeated; two unaccompanied part-songs by Mendelssohn and four of the principal choruses, and the duet (arranged for men's voices), "The Lord is a man of war," from Israel in Egypt. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Vinycombe and Mr. Mace. Dr. Armes conducted.

NORWICH.—The sixteenth Concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union took place in St. Andrew's Hall, on Thursday evening, May 29. The first part of the concert comprised Mr. John Francis Barnett's Cantata Paradise and the Peri, which was very creditably given. Mr. Walter Lain rendered valuable assistance at the organ, and Dr. Bunnett conducted. The principal vocalists were Miss Maude Cornish, Miss Allitsen, Mr. Henry J. Minns, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss F. M. Morse played the Adagio and Presto Scherzando from Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and Mr. Francis Bell contributed a solo on the clarionet.

PORTOBELLO.—On Tuesday, the 3rd ult., the members of Mr. Waddel's Choir gave their second Concert for the season in the Freemasons' Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Brahms's Song of Destiny, scenes from Tannhäuser, and Schumann's Mignon-Requiem; and Handel's Acis and Galatea formed the second part. The choir numbered about sixty voices, the parts were well balanced, and the choruses were rendered in a manner reflecting the highest credit on all concerned. In the scenes from Tannhäuser the parts of Elizabeth and Wolfram were taken by Miss Noble and Mr. Millar Craig with taste and dramatic expression. In Acis and Galatea the solos were well sung by Miss McNeill, and Messrs. Kirkhope and Millar Craig. An effective accompaniment was supplied by Mr. Tom Craig on the piano, Mr. Lingard on the harmonium, and a quintett of string instruments, the performers including Messrs. Daly and Carl D. Hamilton. Mr. Waddel conducted.

ROCK FERRY, BIRKENHEAD.—The new Lecture-hall and Schools attached to the Congregational Church, Rock Ferry, were opened on the 9th ult. with a concert given by the Highfield Choral Society, which, we believe, made its first public appearance on this occasion. The first part consisted of Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden, the solos being taken by members of the Society, who acquitted themselves creditably and in some instances very effectively. The choruses were remarkably well sung throughout. The second part comprised part-songs by Pinsuti, Mendelssohn, Macfarren, and Bishop (in which the choir again distinguished itself), and songs by Miss Dulin, Mrs. Leach, Messrs. Batty, Galt, and Stewart. Mr. James Hodgson accompanied on the pianoforte, and the Conductor was Mr. Franklin Haworth, F.C.O. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

RUGBY.—The third Concert of the Ladies' Amateur Choral Society was given in the Assembly Room, Town Hall, on the 10th ult., when the programme included Macfarren's Songs in a Cornfield (solos by the Misses Molesworth, Miss Callander, the Misses Thornhill, Miss Sadd, and the Misses Buchanan) and Franz Abt's Water Fairies. Miss Jessie Percivall was encored in "Singing in the rain" (E. M. Lawrence), and Messrs. S. H. Beckley and G. R. Vicars were well received in their songs. Miss Emily Lawrence played Chopin's Ballade in A flat and accompanied all the choral music.

TETTENHALL, WOLVERHAMPTON.—Two very successful Concerts were given on May 29 and 30, by the Tettenhall Glee Society. The programme consisted of Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Mrs. A. Van Straubenzee, Mrs. Blunt, Mr. S. Ford, and Mr. Lawrence. The choir numbered about forty voices. The solos were well rendered throughout; Mrs. Van Straubenzee and Mr. Ford gave great satisfaction in the duet for soprano and tenor, which was redemanded; and the choruses were well sung. Mr. G. H. Cox, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

WARWICK.—The members of the Warwick Amateur Musical Society gave a successful Concert on Thursday, May 29, at the County Hall. The programme, which consisted of selections from St. Paul, with orchestral accompaniment, was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Rachel Gray, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Mr. H. Piercy Mr. Frank Spinney conducted.

WATFORD.—On the 11th ult. selections from Rossini's Opera Il Barbiere di Siviglia in Italian and in costume, with some excellent scenery, were given in the Corn Exchange, which was crowded to overflowing. Mr. Faulkner Leigh sustained the part of the Count Almaviva; Mr. Walter Bolton was Figaro, and the part of Rosina was taken by a local amateur.

WELLS.—An open meeting in connection with the Musical Society was held at the Town Hall on Tuesday evening, May 27. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Schumann's Pilgrimage of the Rose, and the second part was miscellaneous. The vocalists were Miss Salmon, Miss Freeman, and Mr. Mills. Mr. Lavington conducted.

WITHAM.—A Concert was given on May 27, in aid of a local institution, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry Bowles, Organist and Choirmaster of the Witham churches. Romberg's Lay of the Bell formed the first part, the solos being sustained by Miss Maud Longhurst, a very promising pupil of Mr. Frederick Walker, at the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Thornton, of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Rev. H. Moseley, of Chelmsford, and the Rev. J. W. B. Laurie, of Witham. The chorus was composed of ladies and gentlemen residing in Witham or the neighbourhood, the greater number of the gentlemen being members of the church choirs. The second part opened with the Andante and Presto movements from Hummel's Trio in E flat (Op. 12), well played by Miss E. J. Hawkins (piano), Mr. Pratt, of Ipswich (violin), and his son, aged fourteen (violoncello). Mr. Pratt also played a Mazurka of Sainton's on the violin. The part-songs given were "Allan-a-Dale" and "Humpty Dumpty" (Caldicott), and songs by Miss Longhurst and Mr. Thornton fully merited the encores on which the audience insisted. Miss Laurie ably officiated as pianist.

WOOLWICH.—A most successful Concert was given on Saturday, May 31, by Mrs. Lacey, in aid of the Wellington Soldiers' Institute. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. C. Buckland, and Mr. Henry Horscroft, all of whom were highly successful. A feature of the concert was the excellent pianoforte-playing of Mr. S. Horton. The Royal Artillery band, augmented by two local volunteer bands, performed several overtures and pieces with care and precision. An excellent choir of fifty voices sang some of the best old English glees, the solos in which were most effectively rendered by Miss Montara, Mr. Raby, and Mr. R. J. Edmonds. The concert was under the direction of Mr. C. Buckland.

The work includes about 50 varieties of the Gregorian Chants, some from sources not easily accessible; and about 390 chants of the Anglican form, of which 100 are more or less well known, the remainder having been composed expressly for this work by musicians of distinction, including most of our Cathedral Organists.

CHURCH ANTHEMS, &c. Edited by HENRY ALLON, D.D. Containing One Hundred and Fifteen Anthems for Congregational Use. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s.; crown 8vo, roan, 3s. 6d.; Cheap Edition, limp cloth, 1s. 4d.; stiff cloth, 1s. 8d.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorals and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

Dr. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte-players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision in its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal frame-work used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

THE

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA COMPANY.

THE following letter relative to the STEINWAY PIANOFORTES from the distinguished Artists whose names are thereto attached, is the complement of the Testimonies to their UNRIVALLED EXCELLENCE which have been given by the GREAT PIANISTS of Europe. It is scarcely necessary to add that the verdict of public opinion has amply confirmed that of these eminent authorities—the STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, although necessarily commanding the highest prices, having by far the largest annual sale of any Pianofortes throughout the world.

"New York, December 28, 1878.

"Messrs. Steinway & Sons.

"Gentlemen,—Having used your celebrated Pianofortes, both in public and in private, during the present Opera Season, we desire to express our unqualified admiration of their sonority, evenness, richness, and astonishing duration of tone, most beautifully blending with and supporting the voice. These matchless qualities for accompanying the voice, together with their precision of action and unequalled capacity of remaining in tune for a great length of time, render, in our opinion, the Steinway Pianofortes, above all others, the most desirable Instruments for students of vocal music and the musical public generally.

Miss Minnie Hauk has also written in the following terms:

"Messrs. Steinway & Sons.

"Dear Sirs,—Allow me to express to you the entire satisfaction I feel in praising your magnificent Pianos. They are the finest Instruments in the world, and I have therefore taken every opportunity while in Europe to extol their sterling qualities.

"Believe me, yours very sincerely,
"MINNIE HAUK."

MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Now ready.

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

Price One Shilling.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

By Henry C. Lunn.

There is an old saying that when matters are at their worst they are certain to mend. As we see at present no signs of "mending" in the conduct of our two lyrical establishments, we may conclude, therefore, that operatic matters are not yet "at their worst." But those who, like ourselves, have watched year after year the manner in which these fashionable institutions of the country are managed, can scarcely credit the possibility of their ever exercising less influence upon art-progress, or ever appealing more feebly to persons whose musical desires soar beyond the pleasure of hearing a few pet vocalists "fully sustain their reputation," or of sitting in judgment upon those who have either not arrived at their prime, or passed too many years beyond it. We are perfectly aware that whenever operatic lessees are urged to produce anything worthy of the name of art-works, they are ready with the answer that such compositions would "not pay"; but may we ask whether, for example, the weak opera of an amateur Marquis—which was played twice during the last season at the Royal Italian Opera to thoroughly uninterested audiences—was selected on the supposition that it would pay? Surely good music might be tried with at least a thorough confidence that it cannot effect more disastrous results. It is true that at the same establishment some amends was made for this failure by the production of Massenet's "Roi de Lahore"; but at Her Majesty's Theatre not a single novelty has been given, although Boïto's "Mefistofele" and Gluck's "Armida" were promised in the prospectus of the season. It may be said that there is little "novelty" amongst the lyrical works of the present day worth presenting to a London audience; but, even acknowledging this, there are certainly operas by many of the greatest composers almost entirely unknown which would assuredly be as much welcomed in England as they are in other countries. The truth is that the inaction of operatic lessees is simply due to the supineness of the subscribers, who care not, provided they can "go to the Opera" and hear their favourite singers, what works are placed before them; and until, therefore, these establishments are supported by supplying the wants of the musical public, we can scarcely hope for any substantial reform.

The successful first appearances of the season at the Royal Italian Opera have undoubtedly been those of Mdlle. Turolla and M. Lassalle; and, although the first-named artist has yet to gain experience, there can be no question that she possesses both talent and intelligence of a high order. M. Lassalle has at once taken his position in this country as one of the best baritones on the stage; and his appearance next season will, we are certain, be anticipated with pleasure. With the exception of M. Gailhard, whose singing and acting as Mephistopheles in "Faust" and Leporello in "Don Giovanni" created a highly favourable impression, no permanent effect has been made by any of the new-comers; and we are left, as usual, to wonder why they ever appeared. Of course the absence of Madame Albani was a serious disappointment both to the subscribers and the public, but Madame Patti continues a powerful attraction, and Mdlle. Heilbron and Madame Cepeda have been cordially received throughout the season. Special praise too must be given to Mdlle. Valleria (previously identified with Her Majesty's Theatre), who has completely won the sympathies of the Royal Italian Opera audiences, her singing in every part she has attempted eliciting warm and well-deserved marks of approbation. Mdlle. Thalberg has retained, but scarcely advanced, her position in the company; and the tenors—Signori Nicolini and Gayarré and M. Capoul—and baritones—Signori Graziani and Cotogni and M. Maurel—so long associated with this establishment, have rendered valuable services during the season. Why Gounod's "Polyeucte" was not produced we are as much at a loss to know as why "Les Amants de Vérone" was produced; but Massenet's opera—Italianised as "Il Re di Lahore"—achieved a fair amount of success, due certainly as much to the excellent scenery and groupings as to the merit of the music. Signori Bevignani and Vianesi have proved themselves able Conductors, although, as we have often said, we should prefer that the artists should not be under two masters in one season; and both band and chorus have, on the whole, showed signs of improvement. Everybody must, we are certain, sincerely feel the loss of the lessee who for so many years most zealously and conscientiously ruled the destinies of this establishment; but we are bound to say that the duty has been bequeathed to trustworthy and efficient hands, the arrangements of the house, both before and behind the curtain, exhibiting every indication of judgment and good taste.

At Her Majesty's Theatre the return of Madame Christine Nilsson has materially strengthened the company, although, considering that Mesdames Gerster and Marie Roze, Mdlles. Minnie Hauck and Kellogg were also engaged, Mr. Mapleson was already rich in prime donne during the season. Mdlle. Vanzandt and M. Roudil may be mentioned as the only new-comers who have sustained the favourable impression produced upon their first appearance, M. Roudil, especially, having fully proved his right to a foremost rank in the profession, both as a singer and an actor. Mdlle. Tremelli has materially strengthened the position she gained last season by her excellent singing as the Caprajo in "Dinorah"; and the services of Madame Trebelli, Signori Campanini, Fancelli, Galassi, Foli, Del Puente, &c., have been as valuable as ever during the season. The production of Verdi's "Aïda"—upon which an enormous sum of money must have been spent—is the one promise in the prospectus of the season which has been redeemed. Gluck's "Armida," Boïto's "Mefistofele," and Wagner's "Rienzi" may probably reappear in next year's programme, to be again ignored without one word of explanation; but it can scarcely be expected that this course of action can be persevered in without serious detriment to the character of the establishment. The band, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, has been excellent throughout the season; and the chorus has evidenced the effect of careful and skilful training.

The Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts still hold the place in public estimation which so many years ago they legitimately won; and although we cannot award the same praise to the vocal as to the instrumental portion of these entertainments, there are certainly signs of improvement. During the past season the Concerts have been highly interesting, and the rendering of the orchestral works, under the skilful direction of Mr. Manns, scarcely short of perfection. We must also make favourable mention of the Alexandra Palace Concerts, the attractions of which are amply sufficient to ensure large audiences. The band is much improved; and in the selections good music is now rather the rule than the exception.

Whatever strictures we may have felt it our duty from time to time to pass upon the Sacred Harmonic Society, there can be no question of the very great benefit it has conferred upon art by directing public attention to the grand sacred compositions at a period when there existed no institution especially devoted to the performance of these works in England. We are glad, therefore, to find that the reports of the demolition of the building so many years identified with this Society are unfounded, and that Exeter Hall—let us hope with some improved method of egress—will be reopened next season for the usual series of concerts.

The usual eight concerts have been given by the Philharmonic Society; but no positive novelty has been introduced during the season. Whether, with the powerful rivalry now existing around it, this Association—which it should be remembered was at one time the only high-class musical Institution in England—can continue its career by placing the standard compositions before its subscribers year after year, becomes a question worth serious pondering by the directors; but certainly Mr. Cusins has laboured hard this season to secure an efficient rendering of the works selected, and on the whole has been more successful than usual. Meanwhile the "New Philharmonic" concerts seem to have entered upon a new lease of life since the conductorship has been placed solely in the hands of Mr. Ganz; and we have little doubt that they will now obtain increased patronage. Little need be said of the Monday Popular Concerts, for the object which their promoters originally had in view has been steadily maintained, and each succeeding year has therefore more firmly established them as an institution of the country.

The "Bach Choir" appropriately commenced its season with a performance of the now familiar Mass in B minor; but at the second concert Bennett's "Woman of Samaria"—the great merits of which do not seem to have recommended it to any other London Society—besides several compositions almost new to an English audience were given, the rendering of all these works, under the able guidance of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, affording ample evidence of the care bestowed upon their preparation. The concerts of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir are annually looked forward to with much interest by all lovers of delicate part-singing; and if there really be any truth in the rumour that they are about to cease, the regret, we are convinced, will be sincere and widely spread. It should be recollected that Mr. Leslie was the first person who ever attempted to train a body of English singers to the perfection attained by some of the German choirs, and his influence has materially advanced chorus-singing in this country. We sincerely hope that we may have many more seasons of the concerts he has so successfully organised; but should Mr. Leslie retire from the scene of his labours, he retires with honours most worthily won, and may have the satisfaction of feeling that he has not only fairly established a fame, but that he has been of real service in the art to which he has earnestly devoted himself for so many years.

The success of the "Orchestral Festival Concerts," although perhaps scarcely satisfying the promoters in a pecuniary point of view, proved beyond doubt that there is a select public in this country ready to appreciate whatever is really good either in executive or creative art. But English people are slow to receive impressions; and it was not therefore until the later concerts that the attendance was at all satisfactory. Certainly for purely orchestral concerts the name of Wagner appeared too often in the programmes, but some of the grand compositions of Beethoven and others were also included; and the fine performance of these works, under the excellent conductorship of Herr Richter, amply compensated for some few defects observable in the selections. We are glad to find that these concerts will be resumed at St. James's Hall next season, when Beethoven's eight Symphonies are to be performed in regular order, and that an extra concert will be given at the Albert Hall for the performance of the same composer's Choral Symphony.

The selections of modern works at Madame Viard-Louis's Concerts have proved to us that "variety" is not always "charming"; for certainly amongst much music worthy of a hearing, we have had some compositions which we could willingly have spared. The performance of many of the standard orchestral works by the fine band, under Mr. Weist Hill, is always a powerful attraction at these concerts; and although we cannot conscientiously admit the bénéficiaire's claims to the rank of a great pianist, she is much to be commended for her earnestness of purpose and artistic feeling. An announcement is made that it is the intention of Madame Viard-Louis to resume her concerts in October; and as the rendering of the compositions of the great masters is so important a feature at these performances, it will be advisable when comparatively unknown works are introduced into the programmes that they should have a higher claim upon our attention than the mere fact of their novelty.

The intimation that Professor Ella feels compelled, in consequence of failing health, to resign the Directorship of the "Musical Union" is, we fear, equivalent to an announcement that the Union itself will cease to exist after the present season; for certainly it is solely through his individual exertions that it has prospered for so many years. It has always been an exclusive little coterie; and should the concerts be discontinued, the last remnant of the many aristocratic assemblies which helped to nurse music in its infancy in this country will have passed away; not, however, to the detriment of the progress of the art now that it is no longer in its leading-strings.

The Concerts of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the skilful conductorship of Mr. Barnby, have been amongst the legitimate attractions of the season; and, apart from the performances given by established suburban choirs—at the head of which must be placed those of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, conducted by Mr. Ebenezer Prout—many new choral Societies have sprung into existence and already appealed to public criticism. The most important of these is the London Musical Society—of which His Royal Highness Prince Leopold is the President, and Mr. Barnby the Conductor. At the first private concert of this Association given at St. James's Hall, Goetz's 137th Psalm and other little-known works of much interest were performed, the rendering of all these compositions fully evidencing the excellent training of the choir. We must also mention the Hampstead Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Willem Coenen, which, although only very recently formed, has given a public concert at the new Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, the programme including Schubert's "Song of Miriam" and Weber's "Jubilee Cantata."

Since our last résumé of the season the Carl Rosa Opera Company has again proved how very many music-lovers are attracted by the representation of lyrical works sung in the language of the country. If, as we believe, it is necessary to accustom the public to Operas in English before we can hope to establish English Opera, we have to thank Mr. Rosa most sincerely for the good work he has already done. We thoroughly believe that, so far from being a mere speculative impresario, he is earnestly labouring to establish a National Opera, and that for the cause he has at heart he is willing to devote both time and money. All musicians, therefore, should lend him their best support; and we have little doubt, from the experience of last season, that when next he appeals to us our confidence in his good intentions will secure for him an increasing share of patronage and appreciation.

We have in some former remarks upon the London Musical Season alluded to the decline of "Benefit Concerts," and the increase of those especially organised for the performance of works both orchestral and choral. Gradually, however, we see the former of these again creeping in, but—as if in acknowledgment that concert-rooms are scarcely suited for their requirements—in the private residences of the aristocracy. Now there can be no possible reason why any individual should not lend his drawing-room for a concert, but it can scarcely be a question that the practice is deteriorating in its effect upon art. In a public concert-hall, however formidable may be the list of patrons, a musical performance can never assume the air of a friendly party; but in a dwelling-house the very feeling of the room in which the concert is given being "kindly lent for the occasion" induces a sensation of restraint upon the audience; and, as tickets cannot be sold at the doors, there is very great danger of private influences overruling public requirements. To help an artist forward is a legitimate exercise of the power of wealth and influence; but patronage may become tyranny in disguise.

The growth of Oratorios and other sacred works as a portion of the service in our churches has been remarkable during the past year, and it is evident that the custom has taken deep root in this country. The introduction of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music" by Dean Stanley into Westminster Abbey had no doubt a powerful effect in urging forward this reform, for when so eminent an authority not only countenances this innovation but preaches a sermon on the occasion eloquently advocating the principle, it may reasonably be imagined that such an example will be extensively followed. There are many works still left untouched eminently fitted to deepen the religious feeling of a mixed congregation, and we trust that persons interested in the cause will use their best efforts to bring some of these forward with the least possible delay.

When we find that in passing through our principal streets the titles of "sensational" songs and contents of periodicals, to which it is unnecessary further to allude, stare us in the face—that on our stages mere realistic dramas obtain the ascendancy, the most exciting scenes in one of which are where two women throw pails of water at each other, and the hero dies slowly of delirium tremens, with a bottle of brandy in his hand—it is not to be wondered at that the feeling should creep into our music, and that a composition performed at a concert during the season—not only applauded, but redemanded—should be a sepulchral "dance" in which is introduced an imitation of the rattling of the bones of skeletons. Whether the instrument expressly used for this purpose, which we understand is called the "Xylophone," will ever occupy a permanent place in our orchestras we cannot say; but, if so, we see no reason why many others constructed to emit equally repulsive noises should not be included. The truth is that "descriptive composers" and "higher developed" executants will, if we allow them, rapidly drive pure music from our concert-rooms; and it is the duty of all who feel the real mission of art to protect it from its enemies. Change is not always progress; and there is danger of mistaking decay for development. To the cool and trained judgment, however, of those who, whilst upholding the worth of those grand works which have placed music in its present high position, are fully prepared to admit that more modern ones may contain an equal amount of merit—though constructed upon other models—the subject may safely be confided; for, however either creative or executive musicians may obtain temporary notoriety by pushing their views almost to the verge of absurdity, the principles of the art have too deep a root in human nature to allow of their being ruthlessly destroyed, and our faith therefore remains as firm as ever in the future.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE CLAVICHORD, WITH HISTORICAL NOTICES.

By Carl Engel.

Clavichord No. 4.

Before describing this curious relic, it will be necessary to explain the German terms gebunden and bundfrei as they are applied to the clavichord. The German word Bund has many meanings. In music it signifies a fret, or division on the finger-board of a stringed instrument by which the intervals of the scale are fixed. About three centuries ago, not only the lute and similar instruments on which the strings are twanged, but also the various viols played with a bow were provided with frets. The gebundene Klavier has more than one tangent acting upon the same string, the different intervals being produced by the tangents touching the string at different places. The tangents represent the frets, inasmuch as they occupy the places beneath the strings where the frets would be if the clavichord had a neck with a finger-board.

A clavichord which has a string (or a pair of strings tuned in unison) for each tangent is called bundfrei. Of this kind are the three specimens which have been previously described. The reader will probably observe that the arrangement of the tangents and strings in these specimens is more simple, and seems to suggest itself more readily, than the arrangement which anteceded it. Most likely the question will occur to him: How did it happen that the more complicated contrivance was adopted before the other?

In endeavouring to answer this question, I must refer for a moment to the origin of the clavichord; and it appears to me all the more desirable to touch upon this subject, since it throws some light upon the early history of our stringed instruments provided with a keyboard, which, it must be admitted, is still rather involved in obscurity, notwithstanding the learned treatises which have been published on the pianoforte and its precursors.

The invention of the clavichord is attributed to the celebrated Italian musical reformer Guido of Arezzo, who lived in the beginning of the eleventh century. However this may be, a monochord with keys attached to it for the purpose of shortening the string at fixed distances, so as to produce a regular succession of tones on a single string, must have been known to him. The monochord, used during the Middle Ages, chiefly for acoustic purposes, was originally supplied with a movable bridge placed under the string. In the course of time, a key with a tangent was affixed to the monochord, by means of which the string could be sounded more conveniently than before. Subsequently, in order further to facilitate its use, the monochord was constructed with a number of keys having tangents. They served the purpose better than the movable bridge, because they always touched the string precisely at the fixed places. However, in order to obtain two or more different tones sounding simultaneously, two or more strings were required; and thus the first attempt to produce a chord on the monochord, by employing several strings and assigning them to different keys, resulted in the construction of the clavichord.

The mediæval Organistrum, the precursor of the hurdygurdy, was constructed on precisely the same principle. If the reader is acquainted with the hurdygurdy he will understand at once the construction of the most primitive gebundene Klavier; the chief difference between the two instruments is that the strings of the hurdygurdy are sounded by the friction of a wheel, while those of the clavichord are sounded by the push or pressure of the tangent. An illustration of the Organistrum, given in the Essay on the History of Musical Instruments published with the Descriptive Catalogue of the Musical Instruments in the South Kensington Museum, exhibits a rather large kind of hurdygurdy, with three strings, and with eight keys, or handles somewhat resembling the keys of a carillon or of an organ-pedal. Those of the most primitive clavichord were probably of a similar shape.

The name manichord, by which the clavichord was formerly sometimes designated in England, is probably a corruption of monochord, although its meaning is differently explained by some musicians. It admits of no doubt that the monycordis mentioned in some Scotch documents dating from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries designates the clavichord. The reader may convince himself of this by referring to "Ancient Scottish Melodies, with an Introductory Enquiry, &c., by W. Dauney" (Edinburgh, 1838).

In the Musical Dictionary by Grassineau (London, 1740), which, though it is but an unsatisfactory compilation, is more comprehensive than other English books of this kind dating from the previous centuries, we are told under the heading Manichord: "Du Cange derives the word from monochord, from a supposition that the instrument had but one string; but he is much mistaken, it has fifty or more."

Turning to the word clarichord, to which Grassineau refers the reader, we are told that it is another name for the manichord.

No doubt clarichord is a corruption of clavichord, just as the terms claricymball, harpsicon, and harpsical, formerly used by ignorant or indifferent persons, are corruptions of clavicymbalum and harpsichord. This is evident from the description which Grassineau gives of the "clarichord," and from his omitting altogether to mention the clavichord by its proper name. Sir W. Leighton, in his "Teares of Lamentations of a Sorrowful Soule," published in the year 1613, calls it claricoales.

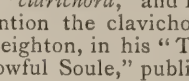
The compass of the earliest clavichords of which we possess some information embraced about twenty tones, which were arranged in a diatonic succession with the admission of B flat as well as B natural. Sebastian Virdung (Basel, 1511) remarks that the clavichords which were made before his time usually contained twenty-two tones in the following compass:—



and that the number of its tones never exceeded thirty. The illustration of a clavichord given in his work represents the compass thus—and exhibits a chromatic succession of intervals, except that the highest B flat is omitted. This is also the case with the illustration given by Ottomarus Luscinius (Strasburg, 1536), which Sir John Hawkins has reproduced in his "History of Music," vol. ii. About the year 1500 the chromatic tones were more generally adopted, and the compass was extended, according to Virdung, to about three octaves, thus—and it took another century before the compass was further extended by the addition of a few keys. However occasionally a larger compass was adopted in the construction of the instrument than the prevailing one. Such exceptions appear to have occurred as early as in the beginning of the sixteenth century. At all events, the pianoforte-maker, Welker ("Neu eröffnetes Magazin musikalischer Tonwerkzeuge," Frankfurt, 1855, p. 106), notices an old clavichord, dated 1520, which has a compass of four octaves. This curious relic was sent to him for repair; and, according to his description, it has the trapezium shape of the old German dulcimer, and its sound-board is provided with an ornamented sound-hole. The date, he states, is inscribed round the sound-hole. Also the virginal was occasionally made in a trapezium shape; however, the usual shape of both the virginal and the clavichord was oblong square.

A century later it embraced, according to Michael Prætorius (Wolfenbüttel, 1619), four octaves, thus—

The construction of the first bundfreie Klavier is generally stated to date from the year 1725, and is ascribed to Daniel Tobias Faber, organist in Krailsheim, Würtemberg. In referring to J. G. Walther's "Musicalisches Lexicon" (Leipzig, 1732), which appears to be the original source from which this statement has been derived, we find that the April number of the Coburger Zeitung of the year 1725 contains a description of the clavichord in question, in which the instrument is said to have particular strings for each tangent, and to be provided with three registers for the purpose of producing three different qualities of sound, viz., an imitation of the lute, a bright carillon, and a soft carillon. No doubt this was a superior instrument of its kind; but indications are not wanting from which it would appear that already in the seventeenth century the clavichord was occasionally constructed bundfrei instead of gebunden.

As regards the registers on Faber's instrument, more complicated contrivances for producing various qualities of sound on the clavichord are known which date from about the middle of the eighteenth century. For instance, the clavichords before mentioned, which Jakob Adlung commenced to construct in the year 1732, had a lute-stop, imitating the quality of sound peculiar to the lute, which was obtained by using extraordinarily broad tangents. One half of the top of the tangent was covered with soft leather; on the lute-stop being drawn, this portion of the tangent was placed under the strings. Furthermore, J. Adlung's clavichords contained a contrivance for shifting the keyboard, which enabled the performer to raise the pitch a semitone or a whole tone at pleasure. The object of this contrivance was to facilitate performances in combination with other instruments which had often a higher pitch than that of the clavichord. Franz Jakob Spath, in Ratisbon, sold, in the year 1751, to the Elector of Cologne, residing at Bonn, a clavichord which, it is recorded, had thirty registers, including a piano-stop, a forte-stop, a pianissimo-stop, a lute-stop, a harp-stop, an echo-stop, a pantalon-stop, a flute-stop, &c. Most likely this instrument was a kind of claviorganum, or a combination of the clavichord with a spinet and a small organ.

These explanations, which are perhaps longer than some readers care for, will enable musical antiquarians to form a correct judgment of my clavichord No. 4. The instrument was found in a village in the Harz mountains. Of its history nothing is known, except that it had stood unmolested during the last sixty years in the same place from which it was obtained. It evidently dates from the first half of the eighteenth century, probably from about the year 1720. True, its compass, embracing four and a half octaves, thus—suggests a somewhat later date; but we have already seen that not unfrequently a larger compass than the usual one was adopted, just as is the case at the present day with our pianoforte; and the superior specimens have had a better chance of being carefully preserved than the common ones. However, this argument would stand for little were it not supported by some indisputable facts which will presently be stated.

The instrument measures five feet in length and eighteen inches in breadth. The case is of deal painted brown. Of course, it required to be restrung; the tooth of time had made so great havoc with the strings that only some rusty remnants of them were left. The following notation shows the arrangement of the strings—two in unison for the higher tones, and the addition of an octave string to the unisons of the lowest bass tones. The brackets indicate the tones which are gebunden:—

The strings are of thin brass wire; none of them are covered. Their original condition was ascertainable from the remnants left in the instrument. It might be supposed that the want of separate strings for the semitones marked in the notation with brackets would prove a great inconvenience. This is, however, actually so little the case that a player unacquainted with the peculiar construction of the instrument will probably not soon perceive the contrivance. True, if two keys producing a semitone, like—are struck precisely together, only the higher tone of the two is heard; however, the action or mechanism of the clavichord is so simple and instantaneous that the slightest arpeggio from below upwards, thus—suffices to render both tones distinctly audible, and to convey the impression of their sounding simultaneously.

The reader will observe from the above notation that the lowest octave is provided with separate strings for each tone. This contrivance has always been in use since the sixteenth century, when the compass was gradually extended in the bass below—

Its necessity is explained by Jakob Adlung in the following words, here translated from the German: "But, it may be asked, what is the reason that the lowest tones are always made bondfree (bundfrei) and not the highest tones? Would not this contrivance be even more suitable for the treble than for the bass, on account of the harmony, the embellishments of the melody, the legato, and various other modes of expression, which are but seldom required in the lowest bass? The answer is, This is very true, were it only possible thus to construct the mechanism. But it must be borne in mind that the greater the distance of the tangent from the bridge, the greater is also the portion of the string which is required for producing a semitone. Therefore, if the bass tones were bound (gebunden), the palmulæ would require to be placed widely separate from each other, and they would be in the highest and lowest octaves so much crooked as to be of little or no use. Even with the present arrangement it is impossible to avoid giving many of the palmulæ a very crooked shape in order to contrive the proper distances of the tangents under the strings."

It is rather amusing to notice the objections to the bondfree clavichord advanced by some of the conservative musicians when it was still a novelty. The innovation, they argued, was undesirable, because it would require a great number of strings; the tuning-pegs would stand so close together that the tuning-hammer could not be conveniently applied to them; this could only be remedied by increasing the dimensions of the case beyond the usual eighteen inches in breadth, whereby the instrument would become too clumsy and cumbersome; the advantage of obtaining at once two tones properly tuned, merely by tuning one, would no longer be insured; in short, endless troubles must be the result. These arguments will perhaps remind the reader of those recorded of some opponents to the introduction of the railway: the train was sure to run from its rails unless there were also rails over the top of the wheels; the proprietors of horses would be ruined; and the travellers would have little or nothing for their money, as they would be almost instantly at their journey's end.

In the beginning of the eighteenth century the Germans still constructed the clavichord occasionally with three tangents for some of the strings, so that three different semitones were produced on the same string. Perhaps the instrument of which I purpose now to give some account had the tangents thus arranged; but this is not clearly stated by the German pianoforte-tuner who saw it in a small provincial town in Prussia, and who offered it to me for purchase. Unfortunately he could not immediately comply with my request to procure it; and when he visited the place again where he had seen it, he found that the people to whom it belonged had broken it up for firewood. Nevertheless, considering that this clavichord was somewhat different from those previously noticed, I am sure musical antiquaries will be glad to possess those details concerning it which the dilatory German tuner has transmitted to me.

In all probability the instrument was made about the year 1680. There was no inscription in the case discernible, but there may have been one. The soundboard was thickly covered with dust. It was devoid of strings. The case had the same dimensions as my specimen No. 4, viz.: Length, 5 feet; width, 18 inches; compass of tones, 4½ octaves. The lower keys (representing the C major scale) were of boxwood, and the upper ones were stained black. This circumstance alone would suffice to assign to the instrument a high age. It may be noticed that the virginal made by John Loosemore in the year 1655, before mentioned, has also keys of boxwood.

The shape of this clavichord appeared so odd to the tuner that he sent me a rough sketch of it, with the remark that the instrument had the appearance of the bench commonly used by the German butchers for chopping meat. The legs were dovetailed and glued to the case. The common chopping-board used by the Germans in making their sausages is somewhat narrower at the back than in front. Also the old dulcimer had this shape; hence its German name hackbrett, or hackebret, which means "chopping-board." The old Dutch designation for the dulcimer, which is hakkeberd, has the same double meaning.

No doubt, it would be in some instances very interesting to know the vicissitudes which an antiquated musical instrument still preserved has experienced; especially, as it may be surmised that the specimens which have escaped destruction have generally been in good hands. If there is no probability of Johann Sebastian Bach having touched the keys of my clavichord, there is certainly the possibility. I have not the slightest intimation that my lute, which dates from the time of Queen Elizabeth, has ever been played upon by Shakespeare or by Milton; still, the thought of the possibility that this may have been the case enhances to me the charm of its sweet and trembling sound. True, an antiquary intent upon ascertaining real facts ought not to be influenced by sentimental notions; he must rather be a matter-of-fact man. Still, a little flight of the imagination may heighten the interest he takes in his pursuit.

I purpose now to draw attention to the estimation in which the clavichord was held by our musical composers of the eighteenth century, since the information derived from their opinions is not only useful for ascertaining exactly its capabilities, but likewise for appreciating correctly the beautiful music which has been written for the clavichord.

As regards Handel's estimation of the instrument, we know from the "Autobiography of Mrs. Delany," edited by Lady Llanover, that Mr. Granville possessed a music-book given to him by Handel, entitled "Krieger (Johann) Organisten und Chori Musici Directore in Zittau, Anmuthige Clavier-Uebung, Nürnberg 1699," in which Mr. Granville, from conversation with Handel, has written the following memorandum: "The book is by one of the celebrated organ-players in Germany. Mr. Handel in his youth formed himself a good deal on his plan, and said that Krieger was one of the best writers of his time for the organ, and to form a good player, but the clavichord must be made use of by beginners instead of organ or harpsichord."

Handel's biographers relate that when he was a little boy he used to practise the clavichord in the garret of his father's house, and that he had the strings of his instrument interlaced with strips of cloth, to deaden the sound, so as to prevent his father detecting his pursuit; for the old gentleman objected to his son becoming a musician.

We find it also recorded that in the nunneries the sound of the clavichord used to be subdued by the same means, in order to enable the nuns to amuse themselves with secular music without their performance being heard through the wall. Most likely these statements owe their origin to a misunderstanding. The strips of cloth were only interlaced for the purpose of checking the undesirable vibrations of the strings, just as the dampers on the pianoforte serve. The sound of the clavichord is feeble enough to require no contrivance for diminishing its loudness. Indeed, its feebleness constitutes so characteristic a feature of the clavichord that the Italians used to call the instrument sordina; and the French, sourdine. The designation dumb spinet, given to it by some English writers of the eighteenth century, is certainly inappropriate, since the clavichord does not contain quills (spinæ) and therefore does not belong to the spinet family.

Considering Handel's favourable opinion of the clavichord, it may appear strange not to find among his instrumental compositions at least a few pieces for this instrument. He is said to have written music for the clavichord during his sojourn in Hanover, before he came to England; but these pieces were not printed in Germany. As in England the harpsichord was the popular instrument, he had no particular inducement to publish in this country anything for the clavichord; but he very likely made use of some of his former German clavichord pieces for the collection of his "Suites de Pièces pour le Clavecin," or "Lessons for the Harpsichord"; at any rate, the second book of this publication, which appeared in 1733—thirteen years after the issue of the first book—contains some pieces which seem to be earlier and less mature productions than those of the first book, and which may have been copied or rewritten by him from old manuscripts, as it was his wont to do also in vocal music whenever he thought it advisable.

In connection with these remarks I think it may interest the reader to have his attention drawn to a diminutive sort of clavichord, or rather a box containing the clavichord action, which is deposited in the Town Museum of Maidstone, and which is said to have belonged to Handel, "who used it in travelling, to strike chords on it when he was composing." It bears the date 1726, and was made in Bologna. Its dimensions are: Length, 2 feet 8 inches; width, 10 inches; depth, 2½ inches; compass, about 3 octaves. Perhaps some readers may have seen this little instrument in the Special Exhibition of Ancient Musical Instruments in the year 1872, when it was lent to the South Kensington Museum by the Rev. J. C. B. Riddell, of Harrietsham Rectory, Maidstone. If I were to give a list of all the musical instruments said to have belonged to Handel which have been brought under my notice, I should probably surprise the reader. Not only would it include organs, fiddles, and harpsichords, but even various tuning-forks, and the very anvil of the famous "Harmonious Blacksmith," which was made before Handel was born. Indeed, no other list of this kind which I might compile would surpass it in comprehensiveness, unless it be a list of the harps and guitars said to have belonged to Queen Marie-Antoinette.

Nevertheless, considering the scarcity of the clavichord in England, the so-called Handel's clavichord may interest musicians.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 362).

Hindered last month by grave matters at the very confine of Italy, we now prepare to accompany Mendelssohn on his tour through Switzerland. Here all questions of art must be dropped. Occasionally our master will be found playing the organ in monasteries, and challenging the monks to give him extemporised themes for treatment. Once, moreover, he talks seriously to distant Devrient about the burning question of an opera. But these are exceptional instances. As a rule we simply enjoy the companionship of a young and ardent pedestrian, full of life and spirits, revelling in the fairest portion of God's world, disposed to be thankful for all good and to make the best of everything else. Nowhere do we find him so susceptible to the influence of natural beauty as here. He cannot use words strong enough to express all he feels, though he tries his utmost. Hear him as he addresses his parents from Chamouni: "I must write to you from time to time to thank you for my wondrously beautiful journey; and if I have done so before, I must do so again now, for more delightful days than those on my journey hither, and during my stay here, I never experienced. Fortunately you already know this valley, so there is no occasion for me to describe it to you; indeed, how could I possibly have done so? But this I may say, that nowhere has nature in all her glory met my eyes in such brightness as here, both when I saw it with you for the first time and now; and, as every one who sees it ought to thank God for having given him faculties to comprehend and appreciate such grandeur, so I must also thank you for having procured me such a pleasure." Again and again Mendelssohn returns to the idea of gratitude to the Supreme Being for so much beauty, and in one letter gives a very characteristic as well as, no doubt, perfectly true sketch of the manner in which certain compatriots of our own did not share his feelings: "When I see people rushing through Switzerland and declaring that they find nothing to admire there or anywhere else (except themselves); not the least affected or stirred, remaining cold and prosaic even in presence of the mountains, I feel a wish to give them a good drubbing. Here are two Englishmen and an English lady at this moment sitting beside me by the stove; they are more wooden than sticks. We have been travelling the same road for a couple of days, and I declare the people have never uttered a syllable except of abuse that there were no fireplaces either on the Grimsel or here; but that there are mountains here is a fact to which they never allude. Their whole journey is occupied in scolding their guide, who laughs at them; in quarrelling with the innkeepers, and in yawning in each other's faces. They think everything commonplace because they themselves are commonplace; therefore they are not happier in Switzerland than they would be in Bernau. Well, well; happiness is a relative term; another would thank God that he could see all this, and so I will be that other." Nothing conveys a better idea of Mendelssohn's intense feeling for natural beauty than this scornful impatience of inability to appreciate it. In the few words "I feel a wish to give them a drubbing," lies a whole world of meaning. Quotations similar to those just given might be multiplied, but only one other passage seems to demand transcription by its eloquence and intensity. Writing to Devrient with reference to Switzerland, Mendelssohn said, "One stands here facing the entire scale of nature; one takes in all the seasons at a glance, from the valley lying in the summer sun to the naked rock; and above, again, to the region of snow and ice with all the mists and storms of winter; and then again from the fields of ice one looks deep down into the green valley blooming with trees and herbs. Is there no possibility for you once to see Switzerland. What is parched Italy in comparison with this fresh life and sound healthfulness? One cannot possibly know what verdure means, what meadows, waters, springs, and rocks can be, unless one has been here. But what is the use of writing? Never have I felt so free, so on a par with nature as I have during these never-to-be-forgotten weeks; and I am determined, if ever I can again roam about during the summer, it shall be among these mountains." These passages place us thoroughly en rapport with the young traveller, and the state of mind they express should be noted in order that what follows may be understood.

Anybody in Mendelssohn's state of mental excitement is prepared to "rough it." The troubles of the way are as nothing, or only act as a foil to pleasure, wherefore our master did not shirk them. All alone, without guide or porter save now and then a chance wayfarer of the country, he trudged from place to place, making the best of difficulties, and seeing a bright side even to the darkest episode. On one occasion, between Vevay and Charney, it was needful to have a pilot over the Dent de Jaman, and, as every man was working in the fields, only a young girl could be found to undertake the task. The adventure exactly jumped with Mendelssohn's mood, and he made out of it, addressing his sisters, one of the prettiest of idylls. We see it all by help of the master's graphic words. He is writing when his guide appears, and says of her, "Here comes the girl with her steeple-hat. I can tell you that she is vastly pretty into the bargain, and her name is Pauline; she has just packed my things into her wicker-basket." Then the two light-hearted young people start, and one of them at least finds the journey "most delightful." He would like his sisters to have such a day. "But then" he observes "you must become two youths and be able to climb actively, and drink milk when the opportunity offers, and treat with contempt the intense heat, the many rocks in the way, the many holes in the path, aye, the many holes in your boots." As for Pauline she is charming—"One of the nicest girls I ever met, so pretty and healthy-looking, and naturally intelligent; she told me anecdotes about her village, and I in return told her about Italy; but I know who was the most amused." So they beguile the way, and as Mendelssohn listens to his companion's artless stories of village life his susceptible nature is moved. "By heavens!" he exclaims, "I felt a strong inclination to become a Vaudois peasant while I was listening to Pauline, when from above she pointed out to me the villages where they dance when the cherries are ripe, and others where they dance when the cows go to pasture and the dairy season begins." Presently we come upon an exquisite little picture. Pauline sees a cottage below, wherein resides a cousin, and asks leave to run down and make a call. Mendelssohn not only gives consent, but like a gallant fellow goes with her. "Soon the two girls came out together and sat on a bench and chattered; on the Col de Jaman above I saw her relations busily mowing, and herding the cows. What cries and shouts ensued. Then those above began to play the bagpipes, on which they all laughed. I did not understand one syllable of their patois, except the beginning, which was 'Adieu, Pierrot.' All these sounds were taken up by a merry mad echo, that piped and laughed and shouted too." Does not the picture stand out clearly?—the little cottage in the green meadow, the two girls on the bench, the young traveller reclining on the grass with his bowl of milk; the distant figures on the mountain-side, and over all the calm beauty of Nature in her placid mood. A little further and Felix and Pauline must part, which they do in friendly fashion, the young gentleman owning to a shake of the hand, but discreetly refraining from telling his sisters a word about the hearty kiss which of course the gifted master and the pretty peasant exchanged. Then Mendelssohn goes on his way alone, or rather not alone, for the spirit of companionship is with him, and when he comes to a cherry-tree where the people are gathering the fruit, he lies down on the grass and eats the cherries they pick.

This is the true spirit in which to see a strange country, and Mendelssohn cultivated it with ardour. At Zweisimmen he sent his knapsack on to Interlachen by post, and encumbered only by a spare shirt, brush and comb, and sketch-book, started to walk after it. Here the Fates seemed to have resolved upon putting his invincible good-humour and light-heartedness to the test, by flooding the country with rain. "For the last few hours the water has been pouring straight down, as if the clouds above were being fairly squeezed out; the roads are as soft as feather-beds; only occasional shreds of the mountains are to be seen, and even these but rarely." Nor was this all. At Weissenberg he was driven to lodge in a house "where there were swarms of vermin quite as bad as in Italy, a creaking house-clock, striking hoarsely every hour, and a baby that screeched the whole night." But even the baby failed to put him out of temper. It only made him observant and philosophical. "I really could not help for a time noticing the child's cries, for it screamed in every possible key expressive of every possible emotion; first angry, then furious, then whining, and when it could screech no longer it grunted in a deep bass. Let no one tell me that we must wish to return to the days of our childhood, because children are so happy. I am convinced that such a little creature as this flies into a rage just as we do, and has also his sleepless nights, and his passions and so forth." Happy nature, that could draw comfort even from a youngster squalling through the hours of darkness. The bad weather followed Mendelssohn relentlessly, but he remained imperturbable. "To-day it has rained for three hours consecutively, and I was well soaked on the way here. The mountain-streams are superb in such weather, for they leap and rage furiously. I crossed one of these demons, the Kander, which seemed to have taken leave of its senses, leaping and blustering and foaming; the water looked quite brown, and scattered its yellow spray in all directions. A black peak of the mountains was here and there visible through the rain-laden clouds, which hung deeper into the valley than I ever before saw them. Yet the day was most enjoyable." Still the weather became worse. Bridges were broken down; roads destroyed, and paths inundated, but our traveller pushed on, a deplorable figure amid the general desolation. "My condition when I arrived at Neuhaus was miserable enough; I looked as if I wore long black boots over my light-coloured trousers, my shoes and stockings, quite up to my knees, dark brown; then came the original white, then a soaked blue paletot; even my sketch-book that I had under my waistcoat was wet through." At last Mendelssohn reached Interlachen, only to be turned away from the inn, and obliged to return to Untersee. This really put him out. "Neither the dreadful storms, nor the various discomforts I had endured, annoyed me half so much as not being able to remain at Interlachen; consequently, for the first time since I left Vevay, I was out of humour for half an hour, and obliged to sing Beethoven's Adagio in A flat major three or four times over before I could recover my equanimity."

These Swiss experiences might be followed at almost any length, but enough has been observed for the purpose in view. Mendelssohn presents himself to us throughout as we have just seen him—full of passionate admiration for natural beauty, overflowing with spirits, and animated by a disposition the most frank and generous conceivable. The littlenesses we have noticed elsewhere are not now found. The mountains crushed all foibles out of him by revealing, as he himself remarks, his own insignificance, and of them he could say: "I do believe that as such are the thoughts of the Almighty. Those who do not yet know Him may here see Him, and the nature He created visibly displayed."

Music was not wholly forgotten during this exciting journey, though it does not seem to have much occupied the traveller's thoughts. At Untersee, what time the rain was pouring down, he asked for some music-paper, and, after being referred from the innkeeper to the pastor, from the pastor to the forest-ranger, and from the forest-ranger to that functionary's daughter, he obtained a couple of sheets on which to inscribe a song or two. The incident is only noteworthy because it tempted Mendelssohn to make a remark very creditable to his growing modesty and good sense: "I can unfortunately form no judgment of my new compositions; I cannot tell whether they are good or bad; and this arises from the circumstance that all the people to whom I have played anything for the last twelve months forthwith glibly declared it to be wonderfully beautiful, and that will never do. I really wish that some one would let me have a little rational blame once more or, what would be still more agreeable, a little rational praise, and then I should find it less indispensable to act the censor towards myself, and to be so distrustful of my own powers." On another occasion he astonished some monks by extemporising on the organ in their chapel, and thenceforward sought out the monasteries when weatherbound. It mattered little what kind of an instrument came under his fingers. Thus, at Wallenstadt, he writes: "I have this moment returned from the church, where I have been playing the organ for three hours, far into the twilight; an old man, a cripple, blew the bellows for me, and, except him, there was not a single soul in the church. The only stops I found available were a very weak croaking flute, and a quavering, deep pedal diapason, of sixteen feet. I contrived to extemporise with these materials, and at last subsided into a choral melody in E minor, without being able to remember what it was. I could not get rid of it, when, all at once, it occurred to me that it was a Litany, the music of which was in my head because the words were in my heart, so then I had a wide field, and plenty of scope for extemporising. At length the consumptive deep bass resounded alone in E minor, and then came, in its turn, the flute, high up in the treble with the choral in the same key, and so the sounds of the organ gradually died away, and I was obliged to stop from the church being so dark. In the meantime there was a terrible hurricane of wind and rain outside." Again he writes, from Sargans, "There is always enough to be done, even in Sargans (a wretched hole) and on a day of deluge like this—for, happily, an organ is always to be found in this country; they are certainly small, and the lower octave both in the manual and the pedal imperfect or, as I call it, crippled, but still they are organs, and that is enough for me." Driven back upon these instruments by the fury of the weather, Mendelssohn began, with characteristic impetuosity, to strive after greater skill in playing them. "I have been playing all this morning, and really practised, for it is a shame that I cannot execute Sebastian Bach's principal works. I intend, if I can manage it, to practise for an hour every day in Munich, as, after a couple of hours' work to-day, I certainly made considerable progress with my feet. Ritz once told me that Schneider, in Dresden, played him the D major fugue in the 'Wohl-temperirte Clavier' on the organ, playing the bass on the pedals. This had hitherto appeared to me so marvellous that I could never properly comprehend it. It recurred to me this morning when I was playing the organ, so I instantly attempted it, and I at least see that it is far from being impossible, and that I shall accomplish it. I succeeded pretty well with the Thema, so I practised in the same way as many passages as I could remember of the D major Organ Fugue, the F major Toccata and the G minor Fugue. If I find a tolerable organ in Munich and not an imperfect one, I will certainly learn this method, and I look forward like a child to playing such pieces down on the pedals. The F major Toccata, with the modulation at the close, sounds as if the church were about to tumble down. What a giant that Precentor was!" Only once in the Swiss letters, omitting that addressed to Taubert, does Mendelssohn refer to music other than as it directly concerns himself, but that once he chooses for a characteristic onslaught upon Auber, whose "Parisienne" was attracting notice as a national air. The German composer seems to have had the lowest possible opinion of his French brother, for, assuredly, no words could be more contemptuous than the following: "Tell me, Fanny, do you know Auber's 'Parisienne.' I consider it the very worst thing he has ever produced, perhaps because the subject was really lofty, but for other reasons also. Auber alone could have been guilty of composing for a great nation in the most violent state of excitement, a cold, insignificant, commonplace and trivial piece. The refrain enrages me every time I think of it—it is like the singing of children to a toy drum, only more objectionable. The words also are worthless: little antitheses and points are out of place here. Then the emptiness of the music! a march for acrobats, and at the end a mere miserable imitation of the 'Marseillaise.' Such music is not what this epoch demands. Woe to us if it be indeed what suits this epoch—if a mere copy of the 'Marseillaise Hymn' be all that is required. What in the latter is full of fire, and spirit, and impetus, is, in the former, ostentatious, cold, calculated, and artificial. The 'Marseillaise' is as superior to the 'Parisienne' as everything produced by genuine enthusiasm must be to what is made for a purpose, even if it be with a view to promote enthusiasm. It will never reach the heart because it does not come from the heart. By the way, I never saw such a striking identity between a poet and a musician as between Auber and Clauren. Auber faithfully renders note for note what the other writes word for word—braggadocia, degrading sensuality, pedantry, epicurism, and parodies of foreign nationality. . . . Write to me your opinion of the 'Parisienne.' I sometimes sing it to myself for fun as I go along, it makes a man walk like a chorister in a procession." This is strong language; but we must remember that Mendelssohn never could sympathise with the French people (between whom and himself the barrier of German prejudice was not wanting), and therefore he failed to comprehend their music. But as to the "Parisienne," his criticisms have been justified by events. The "Marseillaise," prohibited under one Government, officially recognised under the next, lives and is a power, while Auber's work is dead and well nigh forgotten.

Here the Swiss letters come to an end for us, and we part from the energetic and happy-go-lucky wayfarer through rain and mud. In Mendelssohn's own words, "The shabby, dripping pedestrian bids you farewell; and a town gentleman, with visiting cards, fine linen, and a black coat, will write to you next time."

We soon find the town gentleman—cards, linen, coat, and all—at Munich, whither he had journeyed after crossing the Rhine, and now he is plunged deep into the business of his art. But the happiness and content of Switzerland are with him still. Work inspires him: "It is a delightful feeling to wake in the morning and to know that you are to score a grand allegro with all sorts of instruments." Upon everything he looks with beaming eyes: "I scarcely know any place where I feel so comfortable and domesticated as here. It is indeed very delightful to be surrounded by cheerful faces, and your own to be so likewise, and to know every man you meet in the streets." All this satisfaction is easy to understand. The German, after long wanderings, was among Germans again, and his soul revelled in the familiar sights and sounds. But his eyes were more than ever on the look-out for matter wherewith to satisfy a strong sense of humour. The droll side of things was instantly detected by Mendelssohn. Thus, of a coffee-house he says: "I know each face by heart, and find the same people every day in the same position; two playing chess, three looking on, five reading the newspapers, six eating their dinner, and I am the seventh." His little bedroom is on a level with the street, "so that if I unbar the shutters of my glass-door, any one passing along can put his head in at the window and say good morning. Next to me a Greek lodges who is learning the piano, and he is truly odious." He receives guests in this little room, and they play and sing, and no doubt make themselves odious to the Greek. One of them is described as "dulcet as ever, languishing in all the ecstasy of poetic frenzy and grey stockings"; another plays on the violin and makes a "pretty mess" of it, while, in the midst of joviality and noise, sundry formal persons "sit with grave faces." As was to be expected, Mendelssohn "plunged" a little in this boisterous society, but not to the neglect of graver matters. The business of a concert, at which were played his Symphony in C minor and Concerto in G minor, gave him plenty to do; nor are the letters from Munich wanting in the reflections and opinions which make the master's correspondence generally of so much value. At the concert in question, the King had sent him the theme of "Non più andrai" as a text for improvisation, and Mendelssohn says à propos: "My former opinion is now fully confirmed that it is an absurdity to extemporise in public. I have seldom felt so like a fool as when I took my place at the piano to present to the public the fruits of my inspiration, but the audience were quite contented and there was no end of their applause. They called me forward again and the Queen said all that was courteous, but I was annoyed, for I was far from being satisfied with myself, and I am resolved never again to extemporise in public. It is both an abuse and an absurdity." With these words the Munich letters end, to be followed by a set from Paris, which demand and deserve a chapter to themselves.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MUSIC.*

The word "philosophy" or "philosophic" has evidently an attraction of kinship in the mind of Dr. Pole. He uses it continually. He speaks of the "philosophic method" of employing logarithms in musical calculations; and of "philosophic scales," meaning, we presume, those arrangements in brass or ivory in certain boxes of "philosophical instruments." The old use of the word still exists in the term "natural philosophy" we use instead of natural science; but as a rule the present generation, rightly or wrongly, would look upon the word philosophy or philosophic in too ordinary an application as somewhat antiquated. Dr. Pole however defines very clearly what he means by "The Philosophy of Music," that is to say, a mode of inquiry into the principles of the art "claiming attention on intellectual rather than on utilitarian grounds." The greatest composers that ever lived, as he says, may have known nothing of acoustics or of fundamental philosophical principles, and that all they possessed or required was a practical knowledge of their art; but "the argument," Dr. Pole adds, "that would restrict a man's acquirements to those things he needs for earning his livelihood is worthy only of a barbarous age." Moreover, judging from the facts and examples he quotes, it is clear that Dr. Pole wishes us to understand that an inquiry into the first principles of music is not only an intellectual indulgence, but it has one practical if negative value in enabling us to prove that many of the current technical theories of musicians which they assume to be founded on some law of nature, some particular natural phenomenon or scrap of science, are mere hallucinations.

Dr. Pole's work is at least opportune. Since the publication of the theories of Helmholtz, their bearing on the scientific basis of music has been explained and re-explained until we have had a surfeit of the very names "upper partials" and "differentials," "roughnesses" and "smoothnesses." What English musical students have been waiting for is a practical and technical treatise incorporating the theories of Helmholtz, and logically extending the system of music of which he himself has given only a bare outline. The present work does not pretend to be a technical treatise, but it certainly does supply to some extent the want we have referred to. It is the first English book that, less from an acoustical than an artistic and technical point of view, endeavours to treat the theory of music "as illustrated by the late researches of Helmholtz."

It contains the substance of a course of lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in February and March, 1877; and is divided into three parts, the "Material of Music," the "Elementary Arrangements of the Material," and the "Structure of Music." These three divisions may be said to represent respectively the acoustical basis of music, the questions of intervals and scales, and melody, harmony, and counterpoint. The greater portion of the work is a well-selected compilation of scientific, historical, and technical facts. The Helmholtzian philosophy it comprises is principally taken from chapters xiv. and xix. of "Sensations of Tone."

Dr. Pole's own summary of his philosophy will to many readers be disappointing. It amounts very much to the old lament, that "all we know is, that we know nothing." Those amongst us who had imagined that the discoveries of Helmholtz would revolutionise the art of musical composition, or that we were about to have a new heaven and a new earth in the realm of sound, will be grieved to learn that what we are pleased to call the "natural scale," or the "modern diatonic scale," is the same diatonic scale established by the Greeks more than two thousand years ago, subjected to "slight alterations" for modern harmony purposes; that there is no "natural necessity" for any particular series of sounds we call a scale, and that artificial as the scale is and must be, it is the first element in any system of music, and music is impossible without it; that our modern diatonic chords come from the counterpoint of our ancestors, and that chromatic chords are derived by the same principle long since referred to, but in a much more general sense, by Dr. Hullah as that of "stratification." If we attempt to give our chords an independent existence, we find that just as in the horizontal scale we are limited in our search for anything like a fixed or natural basis or framework to the two or three relatively perfect consonances, and that beyond everything is vague and unsettled, so in the vertical harmony, when we pass the triad, although by the new theories we know why it is that one dissonant interval is rougher or smoother or a better or worse quality than another—if, for example, it be a question of choice between three minor sevenths, we as often as not take the worst of the three, and rarely or never do we take the best, except under another name (a high augmented sixth), and in a different tonal connection, and with a slightly different ratio. In our more important dissonant combinations, we take a minor seventh of medium quality, and not on account of its quality, but by reason of its position in the scale. In short, as Dr. Pole reminds us, "music is an art" dependent on no particular acoustical or physiological principle, but on a tissue of principles harmonic, melodic, rhythmical, esthetical, and structural; and, as he says, if harsh combinations opposed to the merely harmonic principle are occasionally tolerated, it is because "at the time they occur some other element of musical interest is offered prominently to the mind."

In summing up the evidence—physical, esthetical, and mechanical—Dr. Pole sometimes takes one point of view and sometimes another, with an impartiality which bestows on his work its chief value. He is careful to separate the collectors and classifiers in the sciences from philosophers, and draws a broad line between the technical theories of music and a general system or theory of harmony. There are certain classifiers in technical musical theory for whom he has a particular commiseration. He would call them "searchers for roots," and he cannot imagine why we should not take any combination the composer chooses to offer without endeavouring to account for it. We confess we do not see the wisdom of the observation, because all Dr. Pole's labour in interpreting for our behoof the discoveries of Helmholtz seems directed to that very end. If the "philosophic method" fails, we must fall back on merely musical methods of analysis. Unless we simply copy the combination the composer gives to us, we must dissect it in some way, or we cannot use it in a different context. If we are to employ it always in the same context we fall into the supposed error Dr. Pole elsewhere condemns of prescribing particular resolutions for particular combinations. He tells us, for example, there are nine resolutions of the chord of the dominant seventh. We have not verified the calculation; but supposing there are nineteen, they must all be on one or two principles we have to find out. The truth is, Dr. Pole reminds us of two principles of resolution, one of which is melodic and the other, strange to say, is a question of root—that is, of the "Basses fondamentales" of Rameau, to which he refers in analysing the chord of the dominant seventh, and in endeavouring from its structure or harmonic elements to eliminate some principle of resolution.

In chapter xvii. he acknowledges that harmony in its full modern sense is a very complicated affair, and as the variety of combinations differ exceedingly in character, their scientific analysis is of a very intricate nature. He attacks the difficulty in this way: he divides chords into separate intervals he calls "binary combinations." If the separate intervals are what musicians more or less unscientifically call "consonant," the chord is consonant; if any of the separate intervals are dissonant, the chord is dissonant.

With the intervals, the fifth and the third, he forms a major triad, which he admits has a "root," even using the word in a special acceptance as "generator" or "fundamental." It is in this latter sense he objects generally to the use of the word "root," because no other chord but the major triad can be derived by the process of harmonic generation adopted by Rameau, and extended by some of his immediate successors to the derivation of chords containing sounds beyond the sixth partial. He reminds us that Rameau does not attempt to assert that his chord of the dominant seventh is anything more than an ouvrage de l'art in some measure "indicated" by nature. Dr. Pole adds that "Helmholtz takes another view." For our parts we do not see that Helmholtz has contributed one shred to that particular question. He leaves it precisely as it was left by Rameau. When, as Dr. Pole says, Helmholtz "somewhat doubtfully" admits that the chord can be regarded as a "representative of a compound tone," he simply in other words repeats what Rameau had stated. Helmholtz makes the same partial and unwilling admission in favour of the chord of the ninth; and we must acknowledge if either is to be accepted as a representative of a compound tone, both being out of scale, there is no scientific reason why we should not proceed in the series as far as the thirteenth; and if that harmonic happens to be minor and out of gear, we can make it major or change the ratio according to our requirements, as we absolutely do in some theories still in vogue. When Dr. Pole and other philosophers chide the musician and the technical theorist for being the victims of subjective views and creatures of custom, we may ask, why do the philosophers insist upon calling the seventh partial a "seventh" at all? Why not a "sharp sixth"? as many French theorists call it, and as curiously enough the philosophers use it themselves when it becomes a question in the common notation of chords.

Dr. Pole complains that English theorists take the root of the major triad as the root also of the minor triad. Are we to infer that continental theorists do not? From an allusion to the nineteenth harmonic, we assume that Dr. Pole is mentally referring to the late Mr. Hewitt. No other theorist we know of employs the term "root" of a minor triad except as a nominal or technical expression, and to fix the position of the chord in the scale for the musician's purposes. In that sense not only continental theorists but Helmholtz and Dr. Pole himself use the same expression. As to the Rameau-Helmholtzian mystification in regard to the intrusion of E♭ in the "minor triad" of C or of C in the major triad of E♭, and the "great sixth" on the sub-dominant and so forth, it all ends in two or more roots; which, considering Dr. Pole's general objection to one, rather reminds us of the "two flutes."

By the system he has partially adopted, not only chords but intervals, or, as he chooses to call them, "binary compounds," have roots; the peculiarity of the major triad being that its characteristic intervals, the "fifth" and the "third," have a common and real root. Perhaps the most unphilosophical device in the whole technical theory of music is the system of numbering chords in the old and happily nearly extinct method called "figured bass" or "thorough-bass." If we number the first inversion of a major triad 3♭ 6♭ as the intervals indicate, instead of 3. 6., we see at once in another form the Rameau-Helmholtzian difficulty referred to. The new numbering shows that, taking the E♮ in the major triad of C♮ as a nominal root or bass, we modulate into E minor. The use of the word "inversion" in the sense musicians employ it ought to be discontinued. What are called the different inversions of chords should be the different "positions"; reserving the word "inversion" to denote a musical device altogether distinct.

The number of separate intervals, Dr. Pole says, is theoretically infinite, but, following Helmholtz, he adds, "it must be recollected we have a definite musical scale on which we agree to form our music." We are to understand that, if we combine intervals of different scales, our chords are formed of different tonalities. This principle he attributes to Rameau; but Rameau, we think, refers all "binary compounds" to their position in the triad of which they are components. For example, Dr. Pole instances the formation of a chord of the diminished seventh according to the principles of Rameau by joining together the diminished triads of the scales of C and E♭. Such a method could only hold water in equal temperament. If it is a question of ratio the two F. F. in the combination are incompatible. It is better perhaps to leave the triad out of the question, and take from each scale the characteristic interval, the sharp fourth or its inversion, the flat fifth, either of which by most continental harmonists is classified as a tritone.

When it comes to a question of resolution, Dr. Pole reduces the chord of the seventh on the dominant to its constituent elements—the fifth and the tritone; with also the resulting or intermediate intervals, the major and minor thirds and the minor seventh. We give preference to the first two because, when we resolve the tritone, we resolve all the rest of the intervals except the fifth. His two principles of resolution are the harmonic relationship, "in a general sense," as he is careful to add, and the mechanical or melodic principle of the least movement of the parts of the chord. "That," he tells us, "is really as far as philosophical first principles can go"; and it must be confessed the acknowledgment is rather humiliating. The philosophy of the subject is this, that "there is no physical reason whatever for the particular resolution of a chord." The physics or physiology of the question ends with the necessity for the resolution at all of dissonant intervals, the necessity arising from their irritating effect on the nerves. We are, however, in this dilemma, that as the new philosophy has proved there is only one consonant interval, the octave, all chords are more or less dissonant. It is a question of degree of dissonance; and in just intonation the intervals are very difficult to classify technically according to the new theories and with the "numerical values" Helmholtz has given as a measure of the relative dissonant effects of each. The very essence of the Helmholtzian philosophy, to our notion, is that pure consonance is vapid. Simple sounds, we are told, are impossible in music, from the fact that the intervals they give are so consonant or so smooth we cannot tell one from the other. Therein is the true "philosophical reason" for the prohibition of consecutive fifths and octaves, and, to a certain extent, fourths. Those intervals are relatively the most consonant; and in music, that is, in the motion of the chords or movement of the parts of the counterpoint, they are the least effective.

Dr. Pole, we think, spends more space than the subject is worth in totalling up the numerical values of intervals to find the sum of dissonance in a chord. Helmholtz only gives the numerical values as a further illustration of his Diagram 61. Most of us have gone into the same calculations and with the same object as Dr. Pole; but were all the elements of dissonance discovered and carefully taken into account, the result would be applicable only to certain conditions in regard to pitch, intensity, and quality, which, as Dr. Pole himself would be the first to acknowledge, cannot practically coexist for one instant in music. Moreover the calculations do not appear to be very reliable.

Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, objects to the numerical value of the high augmented sixth, which, contrary to the calculations of Helmholtz, he finds more dissonant than the minor sixth when the two intervals are compared on a justly intoned instrument.

There is one rather remarkable omission in Dr. Pole's otherwise powerful condensation and focussing of the theories of Helmholtz. The omission may be accidental or by design. In tracing the history of the scale and the influences which have prompted the ear to fix on certain divisions or melodic steps, he gives Helmholtz the credit of discovering that those influences resided in the nature of the sounds themselves. Dr. Pole's readers might, from his explanations, infer that the physical origin of the scale is in the upper partials of the single sound; whereas, as we understand Helmholtz, he employs those intervals only to suggest the origin of the octave, and perhaps its first division by a fifth. When it is required to account for the fourth and the consequent tetrachordal framework of the scale, Dr. Pole seems to fall back on the under-fifth. Helmholtz tells us expressly there is no occasion to resort to that old method, as by another principle, by which we can also obtain the fifth, we get the fourth. That principle is not in the occurrence of certain upper partials in a single complex sound, but in the coincidence of the upper partials of two sounds. On that principle is founded the Helmholtzian law of "affinity of sounds," and the elimination of diatonic scales. Although in that law he might perhaps have found a new principle of resolution, Dr. Pole seems to us to pass it over and hurry on to his own diagram or "graphic representation" of the scale, where we return to old mathematical theories of harmonic relations and simple ratios.

When we finally arrive at purely musical questions, and, according to his own method, derive our chords from "binary compounds" in the scale or in allied scales, he is distressed at the notion of transforming a chord of the dominant seventh into a chord of the diminished seventh by the unphilosophic process of "sharpening the root"; as if, as he says, there were any "scientific connection" between an F and an F♯, or a B♭ and a B♮. But apart from the younger school of Helmholtzian transcendentalists he is encouraging, who would ignore "augmentations" and "diminutions," and even the scale itself, the "harmonic connections" are already settled in the structure of the scales from the materials of which Dr. Pole has agreed to form his chords. He uses and approves the minor-major mode. The mere conversion of the minor mode into the minor-major quietly effects the very chord transmutation he condemns. We cannot see that, so long as keys and modes are permitted to exist, any system of notation, however philosophic, can avoid the relativity understood in the expression F and F♯. The F♯ or fe is purely a fixed Doh symbol; but the modern notation admits of our calling fe, me, or te, as Dr. Pole would treat it.

We are only concerned here with technicalities as far as they illustrate the philosophy of music; and we know no point in which "philosophical first principles" seem more adrift than in the interval called an "augmented sixth"—so often represented by the very F♯ in question—and the chords which derive their name from that interval. Dr. Pole himself, in his method of classifying those chords, all on the root F♮ looking very like the subdominant of C♮, evidently gets into a technical dilemma in his "fourth form." He is, however, in good company; for there is something of the same kind of difficulty in an example he quotes from Helmholtz, where it is intended to show that those chords are remains of the ancient Dorian mode. For his immediate purpose Helmholtz takes the inversion of the modern scale of E♮ major to represent more or less the "mode of the third" in C♮. With the "leading note" and the "minor supertonic" of E♮ he gets a "high augmented sixth, F—D♯, which transposed to C♮ is D?—B♮. As Dr. Pole discovered in his "fourth form," a chord not in its normal position and containing that interval is not necessarily "a chord of the augmented sixth"; and the "philosophic inquiry" has often suggested itself to musicians—is there such a thing at all as a "chord of the augmented sixth"?

The philosophy of music, as explained by Dr. Pole, amounts to the acknowledgment that beyond the dissection of the crude and amorphous materials, science is comparatively impotent in art questions; just as philosophy itself fails when it attempts to analyse either the genius which shapes and puts the materials together, or the esthetical effects of the simplest melody or well-ordered succession of chords.

Such a frank admission does not absolve the student from listening, as Dr. Pole says, "with respect" to everything that a man like Helmholtz has to tell us from the scientific, esthetical, or practical side of music.

If, as Dr. Pole seems to deplore in his opening chapter, the greatest share of our attention is directed to the "performance of music," then indeed we need not trouble ourselves with its philosophy. If we wish to comprehend or to compose music, we must remember that much of the information we derive from musicians themselves is of little direct assistance, and, apart from its special object, worthless; whilst the information we obtain from a scientific work on music, if of less direct assistance to the artist, is in itself valuable knowledge. From all points of view, and from different sources, Dr. Pole has thoughtfully collected the facts and opinions bearing just on those parts of the whole subject treated by Helmholtz which are most interesting to the musical student. The "Philosophy of Music" will be read with eagerness by a large class of readers who might turn over with a certain impatience the laboriously reasoned pages of Helmholtz.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the following gentlemen to serve on the Royal Commission on the Cathedral Establishments: The Archbishop of Canterbury (Chairman), Viscount Cranbrook, the Bishop of Carlisle, Lord Coleridge, Sir Henry Mather Jackson, Bart., Q.C., M.P., Mr. J. Beresford Hope, M.P., and Mr. Dalrymple, M.P.; Secretary, Mr. Arthur B. Ellicott, Barrister. The dean and a canon of each cathedral institution will be attached to the Commission in turn. The appointment of this Commission is the result of a Bill introduced by the Bishop of Carlisle, to amend the Cathedral Statutes, which came before the House of Lords on May 16. By one of the clauses of that Bill it shall be lawful for the dean and chapter of any one of the cathedral churches founded by King Henry the Eighth to prepare the draft of a revised body of statutes suitable to the wants of the said cathedral or collegiate church. The draft approved by the visitor will be submitted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and, if further approved by Her Majesty in Council, will be published in the London Gazette and become law from the date of publication. The statutes under the authority of this Act regulate the rights and duties of the dean, canons, and other statutable members of the foundation; the rights and duties of the bishop with respect to his cathedral church, and chapter, and the rights and duties of honorary canons. The tendency of the Cathedral Statutes Bill has attracted the attention of the lay clerks and others engaged in the musical services of our cathedrals. When the Bill came before the notice of the House of Lords, a memorial on the subject was presented to the Earl of Beaconsfield by eight members of the choir of the Cathedral Church of Carlisle. Their statement has been printed, and has been, as we presume, addressed to other members of the House of Peers. It recapitulates certain facts which during the last four years have frequently been laid before the public. The memorialists tell us that the Bill in question is one of various schemes of cathedral reform which of late years have been "initiated by or conceived in the strictest clerical interest." They complain that in this Bill and in similar schemes the lay element in connection with cathedral establishments is completely ignored; yet it is on that very element the arduous duty of sustaining the daily musical services depends. They show on comparing the relative positions of various members of the foundation as provided for by the founder, King Henry the Eighth, with their respective positions at the present day, that whereas the salaries of canons have increased thirty-six fold, that is, from £22 5s. per annum to £800 per annum, the salaries of the lay clerks have increased only fourteen-fold, or from £5 15s. 2d. per annum to £80 per annum. Moreover, the canons, with an increase of 3,600 per cent in salary, perform not quite one-third of the duty required by statute; whereas the duties of the lay clerks "remain exactly as prescribed by the founder 335 years ago." Whilst acknowledging the necessity for a revision of the statutes, the lay members seem to be of opinion that the position of the non-capitular to the capitular body requires more clearly defining; that the lay clerks should be restored to the position of which they have been deprived, and that their statutable salaries require augmenting "to a degree more commensurate with the duties devolving upon them and more in keeping with the intentions of the founder." They say also, "It is alleged in certain quarters that the deans and chapters of the old foundations have power, from time to time, to effect alterations in their statutes, and that being so it is but reasonable that those of the new should possess the same privilege. Upon this it may be remarked that the power of the former is of a very limited character. It only extends to the making of by-laws and to the regulating of matters of a minor kind, so that whatever alterations may be made by the deans and chapters in that respect, they cannot in any degree interfere with the positions of the lay clerks, who either separately or in conjunction with the minor canons or priest-vicars form corporations of their own, and are therefore wholly independent; but it is very important to observe that this Bill goes very much further—it, in fact, asks for power for the deans and chapters to interfere with the offices and rights of other members of the same foundation with themselves; a power, moreover, as it has been shown, the deans and chapters of the old foundations do not possess; so that were the Bill in question to obtain the sanction of the Legislature in its present form, the somewhat novel spectacle would be presented of having the lay members of nine of our cathedrals in an independent position, whilst those of the remaining thirteen would be completely at the mercy of the deans and chapters; and this is to be done, it may be further observed, for the purpose of assimilating the two systems." In the extracts we have made, we think we have fairly laid before our readers the gist of the Carlisle memorial, and we shall be glad to give publicity to opinions on the subject from qualified correspondents. We shall naturally discourage any observations likely to create bitterness of feeling between the lay and clerical elements in our cathedrals. We have nothing to do with the domestic arrangements or with the salaries of capitular or non-capitular members of cathedral corporations; but in the Royal Commission appointed to consider the revision of Cathedral Statutes we think we see an opening for a more uniform recognition of the importance of musical services in our cathedrals, which were formerly, and, we think, are still supposed to be, the fountain head of Church Music. We say advisedly "uniform recognition," because, to our notions, the principal point in the Bill introduced by the Bishop of Carlisle is that the dean and chapter of any one of the cathedral and collegiate churches founded by King Henry the Eighth shall prepare the draft of a revised body of statutes, &c.; and although the draft is submitted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Queen in Council, it may very well happen that in particular cathedrals the capitular body, if so inclined, may have the power to starve the music. This is again a question verging on the political and pertaining to the general subject of local liberties, and of that variety in unity which is confessedly one of the merits of the Anglican Church. But the members of the Royal Commission will perhaps be so far influenced by the Carlisle memorial as to take into consideration whether it be prudent to leave the musical services entirely at the mercy of particular capitular bodies. In these days, when endowments of all kinds are on their trial, it is not safe to fall back, as the memorialists do, upon the pious wishes of founders. The question will have to be ultimately settled on its own merits; and the real point which a Royal Commission has now the opportunity of deciding is, whether the musical services in cathedrals are worthy of national recognition and of so much pecuniary support as can be spared from the funds of particular ecclesiastical corporations. If the decision be in favour of the musical services, they can scarcely be abandoned to the private judgment or tastes of a dean, a bishop, or a chapter. There is a mean or average level in those subjects which rises and falls with prevailing opinion at different periods, and the question suggests itself at this moment, are the ordinary cathedral services at anything like the level of the educated public opinion of the day on musical matters? We refer to the question without pretending to answer it ourselves at once; and we will gladly rely for more specific information upon the experience of some of our readers in cathedral towns. In giving us the information, they may suggest much that will be valuable to the official inquiry now inaugurated. The Commission will approach the subject irrespective of the special interests of the lay or clerical elements in cathedral corporations, and will consider only the desires of the community or that larger portion of it to whom the preservation of the Church as a State institution is an object, The different members of the Commission will have their own opinions as to how far the grandeur and solemnity of the cathedral musical service, the last and most innocent relic of the ancient pomp of the Church, will conduce to its defence against an attack that it would be idle to deny is imminent. Such a view of the case is perhaps the best guarantee to organist or chorister that his position and social status will be tenderly cared for by the newly appointed Royal Commission.

Mr. J. McCulloch, of San Francisco, has composed music to an Opera on the subject of the "Lady of the Lake," and, à propos to this achievement, tells the world, in an elaborate preface, what he thinks on musical matters generally. Mr. McCulloch is a bold man, and has the courage of his opinions, which, by the way, are as odd as his language. As far as we can make out, he is possessed by a deadly hatred of German music, which he calls "artificially compounded subtilties," and cherishes a no less uncompromising love for the music of Italy. But his hatred is funnier than his love, and we will parade a few examples of its expression. Here, however, we are embarrassed by very wealth of material, with such zest and perseverance does Mr. McCulloch hunt down his game. For a beginning, take a rather choice specimen: "Assemble together every vibratory concordance of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Meyerbeer, and every other composer that ever lived, and there cannot be made up a score of combinations; yet, incredible as it may seem, in this poverty of variety not a single one of the aforesaid worthies has given practical evidence of being possessed of a thorough knowledge of the elementary combinations, few as they are." This is pretty well, but our exiled Scot goes much farther, and tells us that "the whole old fraternity of Bachs and Handels" were mere children compared to modern composers, while Beethoven "in the association of sound and sentiment" was quite a failure. Thus "Fidelio" missed its mark; and, says Mr. McCulloch, in a wonderful sentence, "To single out and amplify a meaningless harmonic fantasy, a kind of purgatorial classic, and try to pass it off as high-class opera is indicative of an overweening meekness too torturously modest." Beethoven, in point of fact, was a poor creature, and "none of his operatic compositions (how many are there?) are fit to stand comparison with Weber's," while "the power to sustain rhythymic (sic) and poetical sentiment and consistency was wofully wanting." He was not even aware, miserable man! of the "unscientific notation which disfigures many of his works," and, like Weber and Mendelssohn, could not tell the difference between "an auxiliary or leader and a diminished seventh." To add to his crimes, he "allowed much to come forth that is trumpery and silly, as, for instance, the Eroica Symphony," about which we are told: "Overlooking the many glaring inconsistencies, bad harmony, and much clap-trap make-up, the whole Eroica is disfigured by a mawkish and discreditable attempt to make a show of much mental analytical profundity when it does not legitimately exist." Other composers, usually called great, are treated in the same way, and Mr. McCulloch smashes our whole pantheon of heroes. Happily he leaves us something to worship, namely, Bellini and—himself, for has not Mr. McCulloch written his "Lady of the Lake" in Scotch style, and has not Scotland a "peculiarly characteristic national music, but little known at home and scarcely at all abroad, with rhythmic beauties and ingenious constructive technological fancies far in advance of any other nation?" Bellini we know, but not our McCulloch; and how much we long to make the acquaintance of such a man in this somewhat uniform and monotonous world there can be no need to say. Will not Mr. Carl Rosa act in the matter?

However much we may wonder at the necessity of one of the qualifications named, when we read in an advertisement for a lady clerk that she "must be tall and write a good hand," there can at least be no doubt as to what is required; but we confess that some of the announcements in the daily newspapers puzzle us. One, for example, tells us that vocalists and pianists are so much wanted to appear at certain public concerts that if applicants for this honour will only apply to the advertiser they will, provided they show ability, immediately receive a salary, and if they require more lessons, "no charge whatever will be made for the necessary tuition." Now as we know very many persons in the latter of these two positions, we should at once urge them to apply at so benevolent an institution, were we not convinced that something more than is mentioned must be expected; for, indeed, were it not so, the house would be literally besieged from morning till night. Curiosities in advertisements, too, reach us from the country, and we have now one before us from a "Theoretical and Practical Teacher of Music." We have often heard of teachers who devote themselves to "organising" choirs, but the one here mentioned "reorganises" them, and "properly trains them for the Diocesan Choral Association." Moreover, he announces that he will "quickly remedy the imperfect enunciation, punctuation, and respiration so generally complained of in choirs that have had their practisings superintended by amateur choirmasters, schoolmasters, and youthful and inexperienced organists." We have always considered that a competent master can scarcely be "practical" without being also "theoretical"; but we presume that the object of this one is to impress those who have not considered the matter at all. For his own sake, however, we hope that he does not confine himself entirely to "reteaching"; for if he wait for choirs to place themselves under him who are confessedly deficient in "enunciation, punctuation, and respiration," we fear that his time will not be very fully occupied.

As public attention has been recently so much drawn to the subject of musical education, it is but justice to mention the grand results which have been, in a short time, achieved by the College of Music of Cincinnati. We have before us a book containing the programmes of twelve Orchestral Symphony Concerts given in the great Music Hall of the City, by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, the programmes of the same number of Chamber Concerts given by the College Quartett, and a list of some 130 compositions played upon the great organ by George E. Whiting (professor in the college), at the Wednesday and Saturday afternoon Organ Concerts, all of which performances have taken place between the months of October, 1878, and May, 1879, inclusive. The high character of the music in these programmes is a sufficient indication of the standard of the College, which now contains upwards of 500 students. The plan of education in the institution appears to be thoroughly sound, teachers the most eminent in their several departments being engaged, and every facility being afforded to the pupils of attending the concerts of the orchestra, the rehearsals, and the Organ Concerts. An important portion of the instruction, too, is the "College Choir," where singers are carefully trained for chorus-singing; the course of study, however, also including general musical education. "We invite to this choir," says the musical director in his address, "only those who are in earnest, and who will meet our effort to teach with corresponding effort to learn, who will attend the appointed hours for study and the concerts. A private student in the college who loses a lesson is the chief sufferer; but the neglect of a member of the choir injures that symmetry which is made by the perfect balance of the parts." These words cannot be too much impressed upon all who desire to attain eminence in the art they have chosen.

Amongst the number of songs forwarded to us for review we scarcely remember one in which any indication was given what voice it was originally written for, or indeed whether it was intended for a female or a male vocalist. It might reasonably be imagined that the nature of the words would, in many cases, sufficiently show whether they were to be sung by a lady or a gentleman; but considering that we now hear singers of the gentler sex warbling the most impassioned serenades, it is evident that we are not to be in the slightest degree guided by the character of the composition. It is true that catalogues of vocal works often inform us of the compass of each song named; but this is a matter entirely of pitch, and leaves us as much as ever in the dark as to the quality of voice intended. If it be urged as a reason for this important omission that a song will sell more extensively when the voice it is composed for is not mentioned, why should we not have pieces published merely called "Instrumental Solos," on the supposition that they are equally available for a violin, flute, clarionet, or indeed any instrument which can produce the notes, and upon which the passages can be executed? Surely what is known as timbre must have something to do with the effect of an instrumental composition; and is this to be entirely ignored in one written for the voice? Would Beethoven's "Adelaide" or Mozart's "Qui sdegno" satisfy their composers if the former were transposed for a bass or the latter for a tenor; and, if not, must we not look upon it as a sign of decadence in vocal music that the same song is published in all sorts of keys to suit any amateur vocalist who may please to sing it? Surely a composer must know best what he means; and, even if his intentions should be disregarded, at least every musician would desire that they should be placed upon record.

It is usually considered that England is slow in recognising the musical works of foreign artists; but two instances have lately occurred which seem to prove that, even admitting the partial truth of this reproach, we are by no means singular in our tardiness. In Paris, it appears, attempts have recently been made to introduce some of the operatic works of Wagner, which have not by any means been received with warm tokens of encouragement; but a selection of his music performed on the composer's birthday was met by an organised opposition, and a disgraceful scene ensued, the noise of which rose far above the Wagnerian strains. It is probable that this hot-headed crusade against German importations may cool down in the course of time; but meanwhile those who wish to form a dispassionate judgment upon the music are prevented from hearing it, and art thus suffers from the prejudices of the few. The other case, although widely different in the result, is the fact of the first performance in Italy of Handel's Oratorio "Israel in Egypt." Considering the popularity of Handel, it seems almost incredible that the Maestro Mustafà, Director of the Società Musicale Romana, should be the first to introduce both "Israel in Egypt" and "The Messiah" into Rome, and that the local papers should now express the belief that the performance of the works of this master will "mark an epoch in the musical history of the country." Surely the grandeur of Handel's writings should have been known to the principal artists of musical Italy years ago; and we should have thought that the performance of some of his works might safely have been tried before now. As we have said, England can scarcely be considered so very conservative, when we find France driving Wagner out of the country and Italy only just becoming acquainted with Handel.

Our operatic managers have been surprisingly reluctant to see that the altered circumstances of the times render advisable a great change in their policy. This remark specially applies to Mr. Mapleson, because, since there must be yet awhile an aristocratic house, Mr. Gye has some excuse for persevering along the old lines. At length, however, there is reason to believe that Mr. Mapleson will establish a democratic opera, like that he is now "running" as a sequel to the ordinary season. Observation at home, and experience in America, have proved to the reluctant managerial mind what should be done, and shown how to do it. Hence we may look for radical changes at Her Majesty's Theatre next year, and it is not difficult to forecast them. We shall expect the emancipation of the house from the coddling system of subscription—at least, to an extent sufficient for freedom from the bondage of leading strings pulled by ticket offices. We shall expect, further, a sweeping change in the interior; and especially a large abolition of private boxes, which are rarely let, and have, as a rule, to be filled with "dead heads." And we anticipate a thorough reform in the absurd dress regulations which bar the doors against every gentleman who is not attired like a waiter. Let Mr. Mapleson do these things, throw open his theatre at moderate prices, provide a good ensemble, and show fair enterprise with regard to providing new attractions, and success, we are sure, will follow. No doubt, Mr. Gye would look down on his present rival from the height of a fashionable caterer, but Mr. Mapleson, with a house full of people and a satisfied treasurer, could endure the gaze.

HENRY SMART.

Sincerely do we regret that our expressions of hope in the ultimate recovery of this eminent musician have not been realised. The announcement in our last number that a Government pension of £100 a year had been conferred upon him we have reason to know afforded him the utmost gratification; and, although he did not live to enjoy the solid benefit of this national recognition of his talent, it must be a source of satisfaction to his surviving relatives that his unceasing labours in the cause of the art of which he was so bright an ornament were duly, if somewhat tardily, acknowledged. Peacefully, and surrounded by his sorrowing family, he passed away on the 6th ult., at his residence, King Henry's Road, in his sixty-seventh year, but, as his latest compositions attest, in the full ripeness of his musical powers. Henry Smart was born in a musical family, for his father was a well-known and highly accomplished violinist, and his uncle, Sir George Smart, not only held the post of organist to Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, but was the acknowledged Conductor of his day. It was fortunate for the art that the young musician shook off the trammels of the law—the profession for which he was at first designed—before the study had unfitted him to develop the gifts with which nature had endowed him. In the profession of his choice he soon obtained eminence; for not only had he exceptional talent as an organist (his extemporaneous performance, especially, impressing most powerfully all who heard him), but his compositions evidenced the possession of an original creative faculty which at once placed him in the foremost rank of his art. His organ works are not only noble examples of musicianly skill, but are replete with a melodious beauty which ever ensures them a cordial welcome. As a composer of church music he obtained a world-wide reputation, his services and anthems having been long universally recognised as masterpieces. At the head of his important secular compositions must be placed the Cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron" (written for and produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1864), which achieved a success fully endorsed by subsequent representations; and there can be little doubt that it will retain its place as one of the most charming works of this fast increasing class by a modern composer. Amongst his other successful compositions must be mentioned the Oratorio "Jacob" and the two beautiful Cantatas, written for female voices, with pianoforte accompaniment, "King René's Daughter," and "The Fishermaidens"; the rendering of the latter of these at a concert by the students of the Royal Academy of Music affording the most unqualified pleasure to the composer, who was unanimously called forward at the conclusion of the performance to receive the warm congratulations of the audience. Mr. Smart had evidently a special talent for writing pieces exclusively for female voices; not only the two Cantatas already mentioned, but numberless Trios for ladies only, being amongst the very best of his smaller works. Within our limited space it would be impossible to enumerate one-half of the contributions to the art which this prolific composer has left us; but in proof that, even with failing bodily health, his mental powers were as keen as ever, we may mention his compositions in the "Organist's Quarterly Journal," every one of which would almost build up a fame as a writer for the instrument upon which he was so excellent a performer. A cheerful and genial companion, Mr. Smart was ever ready to acknowledge in others any portion of the talent of which he himself possessed so large a share; and his enjoyment of music of the highest class was intense. For three or four years he was organist at the Parish Church of Blackburn; afterwards at St. Giles's, Cripplegate; then at St. Luke's, Old Street; and finally at St. Pancras Church, Euston Road, a post which he held at the time of his decease. Although afflicted with blindness, he was always active; and attracted by the organ in the Leeds Town Hall (which he assisted in designing), he was often to be seen and heard there during the summer evenings. His loss, indeed, will be long and widely felt; for never was there a more earnest musician, never one who more heartily laboured to raise the standard of the art he professed and deeply loved; and, as a mark of the national appreciation of these facts, we sincerely hope that the pension granted to him will now be continued to his widow, a precedent for which was established on the decease of Dr. Wesley, of Gloucester. At the funeral, which took place on the 11th ult., a large number of the most eminent members of the profession attended to pay the last tribute to his memory; and the grief of those present who were personally acquainted with him will, we are certain, be largely shared by the many who, knowing him only by his works, cannot but feel that they have lost a dear and sympathetic friend.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

It would be pardonable to take for granted that the Musical Festival held in Chester Cathedral on the 23rd and 24th ult. was absolutely "a new thing under the sun." But it would be decidedly an error, because there was once a time when the antique city on the Dee had a celebration of the kind septennially. Exactly fifty years have passed since the last of those gatherings took place, and any one who is fortunate enough to possess the Harmonicon may, by turning to the volume for 1829, read all about it. In some things it unquestionably puts the proceedings of 1879 to the blush, but in others not. There are, for example, greater reverence and propriety in the present than in the past. Then the Cathedral was given up to workmen for weeks, and desecrated by drinking and smoking, the service, moreover, being so arranged as to occupy the dinner-hour. We have changed all that, and for the better; but in other respects we cannot read the report of 1829 without envy. Imagine a festival with such singers as Madame Malibran, Miss Paton, Mrs. Knyvett, and Mr. Braham, supported by an orchestra one hundred strong (led alternately by Cramer and Mori), and a picked chorus of Lancashire and Yorkshire voices, numbering a hundred and thirty. In the orchestra were Lindley and Dragonetti, while we are told that the principal wind instruments were played "by the individuals who stand at the head of their several departments." Chester, as will be seen, did not try to emulate this state of things the other day; but in some respects there was a curious parallel between the two festivities. This passage, for example, written in 1829, might be reproduced now: "Of the selections we cannot speak in terms of unqualified praise. There was not a single thing in them on which we have to give an opinion for the first time." And this also: "The choral band was admirable. The steadiness and correct time of the trebles was quite delightful," Likewise this, in a modified form: "With reference to the books generally we never saw anything so incorrectly got up." As in instance take the following strange jumble of languages in the 1879 book: "Sopranos primo et secondo." Further, it might be said now, as fifty years ago: "The evening concerts were but mediocre. Nor do the selections tell much in favour of the taste of the Chester public;" and, yet further: "The instrumental band, as we have before hinted, was miserably deficient in all the stringed instruments," though it cannot be added, "We do not mean numerically deficient," for that is just the fault to be now complained of. But when pointing out all this, criticism should bear in mind that the task of reviving the Cathedral Festival at Chester was one of peculiar delicacy, needing to be set about and discharged with great caution. A large party, whose sympathies were essential to success, would never have tolerated mere performances, no matter on how pretentious a scale, in such a place; while the committee could not know how far the public would support them. Great allowance should therefore be made for the shortcomings of the recent gathering, and, though it will be my duty to point them out, no reproach is involved, as regards some, but only a warning.

It would appear that, for all the discretion of the Dean and his colleagues, a perfectly unanimous feeling did not prevail in city and county. I look vainly for the name of the Bishop of the diocese as a supporter of the Festival, and it is obvious that the clergy as a body held aloof, since, beyond those connected with the Cathedral, very few were announced as patrons. This is the more regrettable since it is hard to see in what the Festival, as actually conducted, could offend the most delicate susceptibilities. The "Services" were really services and no sham, going beyond even those at Worcester in earnestness of religious purpose; the singers, soloists excepted, were all drawn from cathedral choirs, and, as far as I know, the most ardent stickler for "reverence" has never yet seen irreverence in the employment of an orchestra. But it may be said that places in the Cathedral were openly sold, and that people who could not pay were excluded from their own church. This was so, of course; otherwise no Festival was possible; yet I am strongly of opinion that the proceedings should have included, as a matter of policy if not of principle, one free service, with full musical accessories, at an hour convenient for the working classes. At Worcester, last year, the free service was a most interesting feature; and there is reason to believe that, apart from good in other ways, it did much to bring popular opinion into harmony with the entire proceedings. But, although the Chester solemnity was not unanimously supported, the Dean and Chapter have very good reason to know that the mass of the public was with them. At each service the nave, aisles, and transepts were full; and, in all likelihood, a considerable surplus of receipts over expenditure remains for advancing the good work of restoring the fine old edifice. Chester Cathedral, as all know, had fallen into a sad state of dilapidation when Dean Howson took the work of repair in hand, and such wonders have already been done that visitors who remember the neglected building can hardly believe that what they now see is the same structure. I heard, the other day, of an American who took umbrage at the change. Just landed in England and on the look-out for ruins, the soul within him was vexed and he exclaimed, "Well, now, why couldn't you have put up a new cathedral right away, and left us the old one?" But we do not all think with the Transatlantic visitor, rejoicing rather that Chester Cathedral will henceforth stand as a monument to the piety, liberality, and artistic taste of our age.

As will have been already inferred, the arrangements for the Festival were on a modest scale, and included no more than two grand Services, supplemented by a Miscellaneous Concert in the Music Hall on the 23rd, and a Ballad Concert in the Town Hall on the following day. The soloists engaged were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Jessie Jones, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli. The orchestra consisted, all told, of forty-four instruments, that is to say, the regular allowance of "wind" against twelve violins and thirteen other strings. Obviously a band should never be constituted thus, since the weakness of the violins is fatal to efficiency; while, to make matters worse, some of the players were not exactly perfect, and the entire machine worked as though out of gear. This was the great blot upon the Festival, and reduced to a low artistic level that which might have stood reasonably high. On another occasion, let us hope, the managers will recognise how far economy in connection with the orchestra is false economy, to be avoided as carefully as reckless expenditure. The chorus gave less cause for complaint. It comprised about 170 singers drawn from the cathedrals of Chester, Westminster Abbey, York, Durham, Ripon, Manchester, Worcester, Hereford, Bangor, and St. Asaph, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and Leeds Parish Church. That the voices were of good quality will be taken for granted, as that they rendered the music with precision and taste. But I must point out that here also was felt a want of balance, the trebles—ninety strong, against about forty in each of the other parts—largely predominating. The excess was, no doubt, in the right place, and the boys sang so well that the prominence of their part gave no offence to the ear. All the same, however, it was a defect in the chorus, especially as the basses were comparatively very weak. At the new organ, which is imposing to the eye, whatever it may be to the ear, Dr. Roland Rogers, of Bangor Cathedral, presided, and the performances were conducted by Mr. J. C. Bridge, the Chester organist, who made his first appearance as the musical head of a festival with encouraging success. The arrangements within the Cathedral were a copy of those at Worcester in 1878; the band and chorus occupying a platform beneath the tower, just west of the screen, but not so raised as to interfere with the vista. In front of the platform were seats for the officiating and other clergy, the remaining space in nave and transepts being devoted to the congregation, for whom also raised tiers of seats were erected beneath the west window. It should further be mentioned that the commodious south transept, still used as a parish church, was set apart for the humbler class of festival lovers, who, though they could see little, heard all without impediment. Yes, another thing deserves note. The platforms were constructed and fitted in the builder's yard, so that they could be placed in the cathedral without noise and in very brief space of time. Even thus far did the Dean and Chapter take precautions to avoid offence. Coming to the order of service, it will be seen that the devotional exercises were considerably expanded from the model set at Worcester. After the Confession, Absolution, Lord's Prayer, and two special Psalms, came the First Lesson, Magnificat, Second Lesson, and Nunc dimittis; the Apostles' Creed and three Collects immediately preceding the Oratorio, at the close of which the General Thanksgiving and Blessing brought the proceedings to an end. It is clear from this that the intention was not merely to give the sanction of a religious exercise to a musical performance, but to secure a genuine service. At the same time, it may be necessary on future occasions to modify the plan, since not all great sacred works are as brief as Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang." Some alarm appears to have been felt lest the public should fail to discriminate between an entertainment and a religious function, in view of which the Dean issued an earnest appeal for reverential conduct. But as a matter of fact no danger existed. The behaviour of the large congregation on both days was that of church-goers in general, and lacked nothing of entire propriety. Why are the clerical authorities on these occasions so ready to assume that the laity have a mind to forget what is due to a sacred place as well as to their own self-respect?

Favoured by bright weather, the Festival began auspiciously on the afternoon of the 23rd ult. The Cathedral soon filled, and the scene was decidedly imposing as, to the strains of the organ, the long array of surpliced singers filed in to their appointed places. The band, by the way, was not surpliced, and the appearance of its members in the foreground of the platform seemed a little incongruous. Attwood's Coronation Anthem, "I was glad," opened the service, and was sung with great spirit and effect. Unfortunately its commencement suffered from a misunderstanding on the part of the organist, between whose instrument and the orchestra moreover some slight difference of pitch made itself unpleasantly felt. But this was forgotten in the interest called forth by Mr. Bridge's new setting for voices, organ, and orchestra of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Mr. Bridge seems here to have intended a pleasing and popular "service" rather than one illustrative of his highest powers; and it is clear further that the accompaniments were not originally meant to be orchestral. Popular the music will certainly become, as earnest of which it was heard on this occasion with the satisfaction which readily understood works never fail to give when they have any merit at all. Spohr's "Last Judgment" formed the pièce de résistance, and no better could have been chosen, since it always borrows solemnity from its surroundings when heard in a cathedral, and never produces half such an effect elsewhere. I cannot praise the performance without reserve, because the orchestra often left much to wish for, and was now and then positively offensive. The vocal music, on the other hand, received a fair amount of justice, the choir singing invariably with spirit and correctness, sometimes, as in "Blest are the departed," with touching expression. Above all did the boys distinguish themselves—the fine quality of their voices, their prompt attack, just intonation, and oneness of delivery being points that connoisseurs could not weary in admiring.

Miss Jessie Jones seemed a little out of voice, but Miss Sherrington sang better than I ever remember to have heard her before, and brought out admirably the feeling of the music. Of Madame Patey, who had little to do, it is needless to say more than that she was in full possession of her great powers; while both Mr. Maas and Signor Foli discharged their respective tasks in a manner becoming their repute. Mr. Maas especially won golden opinions; his pure voice and refined style giving to his music all needful effect. The service ended with the "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," in which the voices were again conspicuous for dash and vigour.

On the following day another imposing congregation assembled, every seat, as far as I could observe, being occupied, and splendid weather lending to the whole festivity a brightness and animation most enjoyable. The order of proceedings was exactly that of the previous day, the music alone being changed. This time the introductory work was the Overture to Handel's "Samson," of which not more than the minuet received anything like justice, and even that lacked finish. An anthem would, under the circumstances, have been far preferable and better suited to the occasion. Amend was made, however, before the First Lesson, when Madame Patey sang Gounod's "There is a green hill far away," accompanied by organ and orchestra. The effect of this could not be mistaken, and every one present must have felt it; with such earnestness did the singer deliver her beautiful and expressive theme.

Then, in due order, came the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis as set by Dr. Bridge of Westminster Abbey for the late Caxton celebration. More masterly church music than this recent years have not produced. It is a fine and truthful illustration of the text—at once expressive and scholarly, appealing to the judgment and moving the heart. To myself it was a revelation of unsuspected power, and it added one at least to the number of those who will welcome any further production from the same pen. Dr. Bridge himself conducted the performance, which was by no means wanting in spirit and effect. After "O rest in the Lord" had been sung by Madame Patey, the "Lobgesang" was commenced and given in its entirety—that is to say with the symphonic movements, which only a larger and better orchestra could have adequately rendered. Here, nevertheless, the forty-four instruments were heard at their best, the Allegretto being listened to with positive pleasure—the more because the opening movement suffered greatly from the weakness of the strings. All the choruses, even those most trying to boys' voices, were well given, and the unaccompanied verse of the choral, "Let all men praise the Lord," approached as near perfection as possible. Miss Sherrington, Miss Jones, and Mr. Maas, to whom the solos were confided, strengthened the good opinions they had earned on the previous day; the first named especially in "Praise thou the Lord," and the last in the trying recitative "We called through the darkness." Generally speaking, therefore, the "Lobgesang" was fairly rendered, and brought the musical service to an impressive close.

I do not purpose devoting time and space either to the Miscellaneous Concert or the Ballad Entertainment. Both were below the dignity and importance of festival work. The performances at one were by no means up to the mark, and the sooner all remembrance of them vanishes the better, albeit they mightily pleased the public. It is said that this experimental Festival will be followed in three years' time by another; and, if so, those who witness it will doubtless have to report many improvements, among them, let us hope, a better use of the evenings, a larger and more efficient orchestra, and the upshot of a wise resolve that nothing shall be left undone to secure adequate rehearsal.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Italian version of M. Massenet's Opera "Le Roi de Lahore," produced at the above establishment on the 28th of June, appeals so irresistibly to the eye that we find it somewhat difficult to gauge the amount of merit displayed by the composer at its true value. The splendour of the processions, the grace and elegance of the ballets, and the picturesque beauty of the scenes so distract the attention that the music too often becomes but a secondary consideration; and it was difficult at the fall of the curtain after each act to decide how much of the applause was elicited by the excellent writing in the finales and how much was due to the gorgeousness of the spectacle. That every opportunity is afforded for scenic effect may be gathered from the following slight sketch of the plot. The first act takes place in the Temple of Indra, at Lahore, when Scindia, the king's minister, informs the high priest that Nair, a young devotee, receives the visits of a lover. She is compelled by the priest and priestesses to summon her admirer, who proves to be Alim, the King. He, having power to release her from her vows, asks her to become his Queen, and they depart on an expedition against the Mussulmans. Scindia, also in love with Nair, vows vengeance against the King, who is defeated in battle, and dies of his wounds. In the third act Alim is in Paradise; but still mourning for Nair, is permitted by the Indian Deity, Indra, to return to earth as a slave, and live with Nair until her death, which will occur simultaneously with his own. Scindia, who has seized the throne of Lahore, appears in state, and amazed at seeing Alim, denounces him as an impostor and orders his arrest; but the priests protect him, considering his appearance as a sign from Heaven. Nair passes by as Queen, and Alim is in despair, thinking she has forgotten him. She, however, escapes from the hated Scindia, stabs herself, and the lovers, dying together, ascend to the heavenly abode of Indra. Considering the excessive length of this Opera, it is an unfortunate fact that the best music is in the first act, and that consequently expectations are raised which are afterwards by no means realised. Certainly the opening chorus and the whole of the ballet music in the Paradise of Indra, the finale to the fourth act, and many of the concerted pieces, prove that the composer has an individuality quite refreshing after the mixture of styles in the last operatic novelty at this house; but M. Massenet is at his best in the early scenes, much of the music of which is coloured with a delicacy which makes us regret that the modern declamatory school should have so influenced the composer in the later portions of his work. The orchestration, although in parts somewhat noisy, shows the hand of a consummate master throughout, the Wagnerian instrumentation however occasionally becoming so prominent as to afford undoubted proof that M. Massenet has not yet the courage to rely solely upon himself. The part of the heroine was played by Mdlle. Turolla with much earnestness, her singing in many parts eliciting the warmest applause; and the small character of Kaled, containing only one solo of importance, was adequately filled by Mdlle. Pasqua. Signor Gayarré sang in the part of Alim, as he always does sing, unequally; creating, however, much effect in the passages of mere declamation. M. Lassalle materially increased the reputation he has already made by his fine singing and acting in the somewhat ungracious part of Scindia. His magnificent rendering of the air in the fourth act, especially, thoroughly roused the audience to enthusiasm, the encore being too unanimous to be resisted. The minor characters of Timoor and Indra were played by Signori Silvestri and Capponi respectively, and the choruses were, on the whole, well sung. The Opera may be said to have achieved a deserved success; but unless the spectacular portion of the work prove a powerful attraction, we doubt whether it will be eagerly anticipated in the programme of next season.

There has been no other novelty at this establishment; but the reassumption of Semiramide, in Rossini's Opera, by Madame Patti should be mentioned, her success in this part last season being more than equalled this year. M. Ambroise Thomas's pretentious Opera "Hamlet," has also been revived—strangely enough, for only one night—with Mdlle. Heilbron as Ophelia, and Signor Cotogni as Hamlet, both artists giving the music with good dramatic effect, but without producing any special impression. The season terminated on the 26th ult. with Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile du Nord."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The singularly barren season at this establishment concluded on the 12th ult.; but a series of representations at cheap prices—upon which we are almost inclined to think the lessee especially relies as the most profitable portion of his speculation—commenced immediately, with the usual orchestra, most of the principal vocalists, and Sir Michael Costa as Conductor for four nights during the week, M. Sainton occupying his place on the remaining nights. During the month Madame Gerster has appeared with much success as the heroine in "Dinorah," giving perhaps a somewhat unconventional rendering of the character, but singing charmingly throughout. M. Ambroise Thomas's Opera "Mignon," too, has been revived for Mdlle. Nilsson, a feature in the cast being the assumption of Lotario, the Harper, by M. Roudil; and we have also to chronicle the cordial welcome accorded to Madame Marie Roze, who reappeared, after her long absence in America, as Pamina, in "Il Flauto Magico," singing with a very decided increase of vocal power. During the series of cheap performances Wagner's "Lohengrin" has been given, Mdlle. Minnie Hauck achieving a marked success in the part of Elsa. We are glad to say that the short season devoted to the non-aristocratic portion of the public has been so well patronised as to encourage the hope that the Opera in this country will no longer be given up to the fashionable world.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The eighth and last Concert of the season, on the 2nd ult., introduced no absolute novelty, but Professor Macfarren s Symphony in E minor, which was given on the occasion, was new to most of the audience, having been played only once at a concert of the "British Orchestral Society," under the direction of Mr. Mount. The first and last movements of this work are excellent examples of scholarly writing, the treatment of the subjects evidencing throughout the hand of a master; but the Gavotte and Musette—which stand in place of the usual Minuet and Trio—fairly took the audience by surprise, not only by the quaint and melodious character of the themes, but by the exquisite orchestral colouring, which, although thoroughly suggestive of the time in which these dances flourished, was positively refreshing, even to those who came prepared to listen to "modern effects." At the end of the Symphony the composer was called into the orchestra, and received an ovation which must have convinced him how legitimately and decisively he had won his success. The other orchestral works were Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, both of which were finely played. M. Saint-Saëns's performance of his own pianoforte Concerto in G minor was remarkable for digital dexterity and perfect command of the passages; but we cannot say that we were much impressed with the music. He also performed Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor on the organ, eliciting warm and well-deserved applause. Madame Hohenschild and Mr. W. H. Cummings were the vocalists; the former giving a somewhat feeble rendering of Mozart's Aria "Deh per questo," and the latter singing with much effect the Barcarole "Nymphes attentives," from Gounod's "Polyeucte." Mr. Cusins, who has conducted these concerts for thirteen seasons, was warmly applauded on retiring from the orchestra.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Annual Concert of the students of this institution, under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Macfarren, was given at St. James's Hall, on the 22nd ult., before an audience filling every portion of the room. In consequence of the distribution of prizes by Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Edinburgh, the programme was somewhat shorter than usual; but enough talent was shown, both in the creative and executive department, to justify us in bestowing the highest praise upon the system of training in the Academy. Mr. W. G. Wood's Symphony in E flat, if we may judge from the first movement, which was the only one given, is a highly meritorious work, both the themes and their treatment evidencing much musical feeling as well as a clearness of thought highly commendable in so young a pupil. An Andante and Gavotte for orchestra, by Miss Cécile Hartog, may also be most favourably noticed (especially the latter movement); and Mr. Ernest Ford's Creed, from a Communion Service, showed that the composer had studied the best models of church music. The pianoforte-playing—represented by Miss Maud Willett in the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, and Mr. F. W. W. Bampfylde in two movements from Schumann's Concerto in A minor—displayed not only the effect of sound teaching, but much talent in the players. A violin solo by Master J. Payne elicited hearty and well-deserved applause, both the tone and execution of the juvenile performer giving every promise of future excellence. The solo vocalists were Miss Ada Patterson, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Davies, and Mr. Arthur F. Jarratt (the latter of whom sang with much effect a graceful song by his fellow-student, Mr. Myles B. Foster), and several other pupils joined in some concerted pieces. At the conclusion of the concert Professor Macfarren, in an eloquent address, spoke of the continued prosperity of the institution—upwards of 400 pupils now actually studying in the Academy—and after thanking the Duchess of Edinburgh for attending on the occasion, the prizes were distributed as follows:—

The Lucas silver medal (for a composition of a Scena for voice and orchestra), Arthur G. Thomas; the Parepa-Rosa gold medal (singing), J. Hervet d'Egville; the Sterndale-Bennett, first prize, purse of ten guineas (pianoforte), Margaret Gyde; second prize (purse of five guineas), Alice Heathcote; the Llewellyn Thomas gold medal (for declamatory English singing), Marian M'Kenzie; the Evill prize (for ditto), Arthur F. Jarratt; the Heathcote Long prize, purse of ten guineas (pianoforte), F. W. W. Bampfylde; the Read prizes, purses of £25 and £10 (for composition of a quartett for piano and bowed instruments), first prize to Tobias A. Matthay, second to Henry R. Rose. Certificates of Merit: A. E. Bolingbroke, A. Patterson, C. Samuell, E. Goldsbro, D. Shapley, O. L. Prescott, A. F. Jarratt, and R. George. Silver Medals: S. Ambler, I. Ware, A. Hazard, E. Gregory, M. Gyde, W. H. Brereton, J. L. Hutchinson, J. Grantley, S. Tower, E. Flavell, P. Stranders, J. Payne, A. Harper, M. B. Foster, and W. G. Wood. A very large number of bronze medals were also given.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE first Concert of this newly formed Society—given in St. James's Hall on the 27th of June—sufficiently attested the fact that amateurs are willing to band themselves into choral bodies, under the direction of an experienced Conductor, not with the desire of competing with those associations which have done so much good in presenting the standard works to an English audience, but with the avowed purpose of introducing comparatively unknown compositions of merit which the large number of paying concert-goers termed the "general public," are somewhat slow to appreciate. That this was a "private concert," however, must have astonished those who, on entering the hall, found almost every seat occupied; and, although it may be said that some few were attracted by feelings of friendship with the artists engaged in the performance, the demeanour of the entire audience throughout the concert was such as to show that the music, unfamiliar as it was, created a profound impression upon every listener. Handel's sixth Chandos Anthem, which was the first piece in the programme, was finely sung, the difficulties being surmounted most creditably, considering how short a time the choir has been in existence. Every point was attacked with decision, the experienced conducting of Mr. Barnby materially helping the weak and strengthening the strong in the general rendering of the work. The orchestra too was everything that could be desired, the excellent additional accompaniments of Mr. E. Silas, which were used on the occasion, never asserting themselves with undue prominence. Hermann Goetz's setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," given for the first time in this country, is not only the noblest and most perfect work of this composer with which we are acquainted, but one of those delicately coloured and sympathetic creations the sacred and reverential feeling in which cannot but deepen the effect of the scriptural text even to the most impassive hearer. The dramatic power too, evidenced as much in the tearful words of sorrow as in the stirring cries for revenge, convince us that the composer, had he lived, would have earned for himself a high name in the lyrical drama. The work produced an almost electrical effect upon the audience; and now that its excessive beauties have been so successfully revealed, there can be little doubt that it will at once take its place amongst the greatest compositions in sacred art. The solos in Handel's Anthem, although most efficiently rendered by Miss H. C. Weber, the Viscountess Downe, Mr. T. Marzials, and Mr. Charles Wade, scarcely invite criticism; but in Goetz's Psalm the singing of Miss Carina Clelland (who is but too little known in the metropolis) was of a high order of excellence, and elicited warm and well-deserved applause. The second part of the concert was devoted to an orchestral arrangement, by H. Esser, of Bach's Toccata in F, and Dr. F. Hiller's well-written and effective "Song of Victory"; in the last-named work Miss Clelland again proving herself a genuine artist by her intelligent rendering of the solos. Mr. Barnby conducted throughout with much care and judgment, his efforts being ably seconded by all the members of the orchestra as well as the choir. So excellent an inauguration concert encourages us to hope that this Society—which is presided over by H.R.H. Prince Leopold—will achieve great results in the future; for not only do we find on the list of the committee names of the highest influence, but the performing members are evidently earnest workers in the good cause they have undertaken; and with so perfect an organisation a decisive and permanent success may be ensured.

THE SNOXELL COLLECTION AND HANDELIAN RELICS.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson have recently sold a remarkable collection of curiosities under the above title. At the first day's sale (June 9) they disposed of the miniatures and enamels, more than 200 lots, including a few portraits of deceased musicians. On the second day about 200 lots of paintings and medallions, bronzes, china, &c., were sold. Many of these were interesting to musical amateurs, notably an oil-painting by Wollfgang representing George Frederic Handel; although the resemblance to other portraits of Handel was not striking, the picture was engraved almost immediately after it was painted, and it was therefore interesting to compare the somewhat scarce engraving with its original. On the third day of the sale nearly 200 lots of "mechanical automata, musical instruments, Handelian relics, clocks and watches, ormolu ornaments, &c.," were brought under the auctioneer's hammer. A more extraordinary collection of articles it would be difficult to find—automaton rope-dancers, musicians, life-size performing organists, piping bullfinches, a phœnix pecking her breast and feeding her young with blood, dancing bears, magicians, flying birds, drummer-boys, performing elephants, and "The original anvil and hammer of the Harmonious Blacksmith from which Handel composed his celebrated air." It was somewhat depressing to find this worn-out piece of imposture and monument of enthusiastic ignorance and credulity, still in existence, and it was wonderful to note that it sold for £13; but as the purchasers were Messrs. Maskelyne and Cooke, well known for their clever feats of sleight-of-hand and deception, it is to be hoped they will be able to turn the miserable lump of old iron to profitable account. We would suggest that they should arrange to have Handel's celebrated air performed on the anvil with a trumpet obbligato by Fanfare. The fourth day's sale included musical instruments, statuary, theatrical dresses, jewellery, &c. The books, music, and engravings were sold on several succeeding days; and finally, on the 21st ult., the autographs and manuscripts were dispersed. Great interest was attached to the last day's sale, as it had been announced that Handel's will, in his own autograph, would be included in the catalogue. It was very generally known that Mr. Snoxell had been for years the possessor of this relic of the great composer, reference having been made to it by M. Schœlcher in his life of Handel; much speculation was therefore rife as to whether the coveted prize would be bought by some of our national trustees or whether the German Handel Society would secure it, but it was purchased by Mr. W. H. Cummings for £53. How it came to pass that various national and local institutions allowed such an opportunity to slip, it would be vain to inquire. The will is wholly in English and is entirely in Handel's handwriting, with a fine bold signature, "George Frideric Handel," the date of the document being June, 1750; this is followed by a codicil dated August, 1756, not in Handel's autograph, but the signature which is his, "George Frideric Handel," as before, at once suggests why he did not write the codicil himself—it is the signature of a blind man. A second codicil, signed by Handel, gives colour to the supposition that at the date, March, 1757, he had partially recovered his sight; in a third codicil, dated August of the same year, the signature again appears as if written by one quite blind; and a fourth codicil, dictated and signed on the 11th of April, 1759, only three days before he died, is subscribed in a faltering and feeble hand, "G. F. Handel." This last is witnessed by Rudd and Handel's amanuensis, J. Christopher Smith; and it is interesting to note that by this document, made almost in articulo mortis, the "Royal Society of Musicians," of which Handel was a member, received a legacy of one thousand pounds, and instructions are given for the expenditure of a sum "not exceeding six hundred pounds" to erect a monument in Westminster Abbey.

The last day's sale included the inventory of Handel's household goods taken immediately after his decease: this curious document was also bought by Mr. Cummings. Handel's watch, with his name engraved on the case, was bought by an anonymous purchaser.

Mr. Snoxell the late owner of the properties we have enumerated was an amateur violinist, and was for many years associated with the Sacred Harmonic Society in that capacity. He also essayed to become a composer, but, judging from a published volume of his compositions now lying before us, succeeded but indifferently in his endeavours; for, although fairly free from error, they are wanting in interest, and exhibit no indication of talent.

The competition for the Sterndale-Bennett prize of ten guineas for pianoforte-playing was held on the 3rd ult. at the Royal Academy of Music. The examiners were Messrs. Charles Hallé, A. Schloesser, and W. Dorrell. There were twenty-two candidates, and the prize was awarded to Margaret Gyde. A second prize of five guineas, presented by Mr. W. Dorrell, was awarded to Alice Heathcote. The competition for the Heathcote Long prize of ten guineas for pianoforte-playing was also held, the examiners being the same. From among eleven candidates the prize was awarded to F. W. W. Bampfylde. The competition for the Parepa-Rosa gold medal for singing was held on the 5th ult., the examiners being Messrs. Henschel, Lewis Thomas, and Li Calsi (chairman). There were ten candidates, and the medal was awarded to John H. d'Egville. The competition for the Lucas medal for composition was decided on the 14th ult. The examiners were Mr. G. A. Osborne, Signor C. Pinsuti and Mr. Charles E. Stephens, (chairman). There were nine candidates, and the medal was awarded to Arthur G. Thomas.

An extremely successful private Organ Recital was given in Westminster Abbey on Monday evening the 7th ult., by Dr. J. Fredk. Bridge, Organist of the Abbey, assisted by his clever young pupil and assistant, Mr. W. A. Collard. The audience consisted chiefly of the clergy and officers connected with the Abbey, and their families. The programme was well selected, and included Saint-Saëns's Rhapsodie in D, Bach's Toccata in F, two compositions of Sterndale Bennett, an Andante from the fifth Sonata of Gustav Merkel, and several other interesting works, all of which were admirably rendered. Mendelssohn's second Sonata was effectively played by a young lady, a pupil of Dr. Bridge's at the National Training School for Music; and Wagner's Pilgrims' Chorus, from "Tannhäuser" was well performed as a duet by Dr. Bridge and Mr. W. A. Collard. The Recital was keenly appreciated by the select audience assembled.

At the Alexandra Palace, on June 28, a Concert was given, at which Miss José Sherrington, Mdme. Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Sims Reeves appeared. Mr. Reeves, who sang "The Macgregor's gathering" and "The minstrel boy," was received by the large audience in the usual enthusiastic manner, but declined the vociferous encore awarded to him for his last song. The Choir sang, amongst other pieces, Handel's Coronation Anthem, "Zadock the Priest," and a Chorus, "Sound the loud timbrel," from Schachner's "Israel's Return from Babylon." In the evening, Macfarren's Opera "Robin Hood" was performed, Mdlle. Blanche Cole, Miss Lucy Franklein, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. Aynsley Cook, and Mr. J. W. Turner being the principals. On the 12th ult. Haydn's "Creation" was given, and weekly Concerts in the Central Hall and Grove have taken place during the month.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its 126th monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms, on Friday, the 4th ult., the programme being of a miscellaneous character. The Choir was heard to advantage in several Glees, Part-songs, &c., more especially in Mendelssohn's "Vintage Song," for male voices, Rossini's "Carnovale," "O bird of eve" (Lord Mornington), and "Good night, farewell" (Garrett), the solos in which were carefully rendered by Miss Alice Lee, and Mr. R. E. Harvey. Miss Coyte Turner, Miss Bessie Spear, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. E. J. Bell, were warmly applauded for their singing of several songs, and Miss Julia Augarde gave two pianoforte solos in a finished manner, both being redemanded. Miss E. Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkee were efficient accompanists. Mr. T. Garside conducted.

The Grosvenor Choral Society's eighty-ninth Monthly Concert was given on Friday, the 18th ult., at the Grosvenor Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Auber's Opera "Masaniello," including the Chorus of Fishermen, the Barcarolle, the Prayer, the March and Chorus, and the Market Chorus (encored). Several part-songs were given in the second part with much expression and finish. Mr. T. F. Williams received an enthusiastic encore for his clever performance on the concertina. Miss Nellie Dakin, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. T. P. Frame and Mr. W. Lloyd were the solo vocalists. The Misses Hartley and Hemming presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. H. Maunder at the harmonium. Mr. Henry Baker conducted.

We are informed that an Association has been formed in Edinburgh, under the name of the Scottish Musical Society, the object of which is to foster music in general, and especially to encourage native talent. The promoters of the movement hope to draw attention to the needs of musical art, and ultimately to ensure the presence in Edinburgh of a permanent orchestra. The Society already includes many persons of influence in the city, prominent amongst whom is Dr. Donaldson; and the conductorship has been placed in the experienced hands of Mr. Carl D. Hamilton. We need scarcely say that we cordially wish this new enterprise every success.

A Report just issued by the Education Department shows the extent to which singing is taught in elementary schools, and the proportion in which various methods are used. In England and Wales, 697 schools use Mr. Hullah's system, 534 use the old notation with the movable do, 44 use more than one system, and 2,297 use Mr. Curwen's Tonic Sol-fa system. Of the remaining 19,921 schools, by far the larger proportion teach by ear. In Scotland, only 10 schools use Mr. Hullah's system, 105 use the old notation with the movable do, 25 use more than one system, and 1,338 use Tonic Sol-fa. The remaining 1,404, a less proportion than in England, teach by ear.

A Concert was given at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, on Wednesday evening, the 16th ult., the vocalists being Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss D'Arcy, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. Latta, Mr. Bromhall, and Mr. Lynde. Mr. Parker was the solo pianist, and Herr Oberthur performed on the harp. The second part of the evening was occupied with selections from Rossini's Opera, "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," in costume and with appointments. Mr. Faulkner Leigh made a capital Almaviva; Mr. Walter Bolton an equally good Figaro, and Miss Helen D'Arcy's Rosina was a decided success. Mr. Henry Parker conducted the opera.

A very successful Concert took place on the 22nd ult., in the Albion Hall, London Wall, City, by the members of the London Excelsior Band of Hope, assisted by a chorus of nearly 200 voices, the programme consisting of the music performed at the Crystal Palace on the 8th ult. Several of the pieces were received with great enthusiasm and encored. Mr. Williams (General Superintendent of the choir arrangements at the Crystal Palace) conducted with much efficiency, and Mr. J. Marsh (Organist of St. Chad's, Haggerstone) very ably presided at the harmonium.

Mr. John Farmer's Oratorio, "Christ and His Soldiers," was performed at St. James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 5th ult. The soloists were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Arthur Hooper, and Mr. Thurley Beale, with an orchestra and chorus (including Mr. Stedman's choir boys) of 350 performers. The Oratorio was preceded by the "Pageant Music," or Serenade for full orchestra, written by the same composer for the opening of the Art Museum, at Nottingham, which was well received, one number being encored. Mr. H. J. Stark, Mus. Bac., was the Organist, and Mr. John Farmer conducted.

On Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., the first of the second series of weekly Promenade Concerts was given at the Marble Rink, Clapham Road. Among other artists of established reputation who have appeared at these entertainments may be mentioned Mesdames Edith Wynne, Frances Brooke, and Osborne Williams; Messrs. Pearson, Barton McGuckin, Ludwig, Brocolini, and Thurley Beale. The Bedford Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. Cittens, gave a commendable rendering of Mr. George Fox's comic Cantata "The Jackdaw of Rheims."

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung at the evening service at St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, on the 13th ult., and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on the 27th ult. On both occasions the choir numbered about 100 voices, and there was a full orchestra, including many eminent orchestral players. The congregations were very large, and the execution of both works, under the direction of Mr. Stedman, was most satisfactory. Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Haydn's "Creation" will be sung on the 10th and 24th inst. respectively.

Mr. Worsley Staniforth gave an interesting Concert in the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on Friday the 18th ult., a special feature of which was the concertina-playing of Signor Alsepti, of Exeter. Mr. Staniforth played his own Rondino in F for pianoforte, and Monsieur Albert a Morceau de Salon for violoncello. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr. Harper Kearton, and several members of the choir of St. Paul's, Regent's Park.

Miss Nessie Goode gave a Concert on Thursday morning, the 3rd ult., at the residence of Major Wallace Carpenter, which was well attended. She was ably assisted by several students of the Royal Academy of Music (of which the bénéficiaire is an Associate) and also by several eminent members of the profession. Miss Goode's singing elicited warm and deserved applause from a highly appreciative audience.

The Dedication Festival at St. Margaret's, Rood Lane, was held on the 20th ult., when Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" was given at the morning service and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was sung as the evening anthem. There was a large choir and a full orchestra at each service, and both works were excellently rendered under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The congregation, both morning and evening, was very large.

Mdlle. Leona Fabre gave an excellent Concert at the French Embassy, Albert Gate, on Monday afternoon, the 7th ult., assisted by several well-known vocalists and instrumentalists. The pianoforte-playing of Mdlle. Fabre was the principal feature in the programme, her rendering of a selection of well-chosen pieces of varied styles successfully testing her artistic powers.

The St. Paul's Amateur Musical Society gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" at the Eyre Arms on the 27th of June. The Society was assisted in the performance by a small band of instrumentalists. Mons. Albert presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Worsley Staniforth at the harmonium. The Rev. J. W. Bennett was the Conductor.

A Recital of Donizetti's Opera "Linda di Chamouni," was given at the Steinway Hall on the 5th ult., with full orchestral accompaniments, conducted by Mr. W. Carter. The artists engaged were Miss Ada Lincoln, Mdlle. Franchi, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Signori Vergara and Monari Rocca. The Recital was very well attended.

The artists engaged at the approaching Birmingham Musical Festival are: Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Etelka Gerster, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, and Herr Henschel. Herr Max Bruch and M. Saint-Saëns will attend the rehearsals of their respective compositions.

On the 21st ult., Mr. Coburn, Conductor of the Grove House Choral Society (consisting of ladies and gentlemen in the establishment of Spencer, Turner, and Boldero, Lisson Grove), was presented with a silver-mounted bâton bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. C. Coburn by his friends of Lisson Grove."

The artists engaged at the Bristol Musical Festival in October are Madame Albani, Miss Emma Thursby, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Barton McGuckin, Santley, and R. Hilton.

Miss Clara Louise Kellogg will soon leave London for Italy, returning before the winter sets in. She purposes remaining in Europe for some time and will probably turn her attention to Oratorio.

We understand that the organ built by Messrs. Bevington and Sons, of Soho, London, for the North London Collegiate School for Girls, Camden Road, at a cost of £300, is the gift of the pupils.

Another Festival in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund is arranged to be held in Worcester on or about October 2, after that which (as we announced in our last) is to take place at Bath.

Dr. Sloman's Cantata "Supplication and Praise" will be performed by the Norwood Choral Society during the ensuing autumn, the work being now in active rehearsal.

REVIEWS.

Frederic Chopin: His Life, Letters, and Works. By Moritz Karasowski. Translated by Emily Hill.
[William Reeves.]

In the preface to this work the author tells us that just as he had finished transcribing the first series of Chopin's letters—written in the days of his youth—and was on the point of chronologically arranging the second (Paris correspondence), the insurrection of 1863 broke out in Poland; and this not being a favourable time for literary and artistic productions, the letters were given back to his family. How these interesting records of the brightest portion of the composer's life were wantonly destroyed is told in the following words: "When the brutal and insensate soldiery arrived at the second storey of the house inhabited by Chopin's sister, the mementoes of the great artist, which the whole family cherished with such pious care, were doomed to destruction. The piano—one of Buckholtz's—on which he had received his earliest instruction, and which had been the confidant and interpreter of his first musical ideas, was flung into the street by these Vandals. At night the soldiers made a stack of the ruined furniture in the square at the foot of the statue of Copernicus, and filling their kettles with wine, spirit, and sugar from the ransacked shops, they made merry round the fire, mixing punch and singing boisterous songs. Pictures, books, and papers—among the latter Chopin's correspondence with his family during eighteen years—were thrown in to feed the flames. The reflection which illumined the city announced to the terrified inhabitants that the reign of military terror had begun." All musicians must deeply deplore the loss of these letters; for as the author of this work, who well knew their contents, tells us, in these genial communications to his parents, "he poured forth all his affection for his family, his love for his country, his enthusiasm for his art, and his admiration for all that is beautiful and noble." But in spite of this calamity, the volume before us has a deep interest; for, apart from the letters happily preserved to us, ample material has been supplied by Chopin's sole surviving sister; and not only, therefore, have we a detailed record of the artist's career, but no reasonable doubt can exist as to the authenticity of the events narrated. That Chopin was a remarkable pianist as a mere child is a fact beyond dispute, for at nine years of age he excited the utmost wonder in the Warsaw drawing-rooms by his playing, and was invited, at that age, to perform at a concert for the benefit of the poor. Catalani, when passing through Warsaw, was so delighted with the artistic playing of the youthful virtuoso that she presented him with a gold watch, on the back of which was inscribed "Donné par Madame Catalani à Frédéric Chopin, âgé de dix ans"; and the harsh and violent Grand Prince Constantine, the terror of those around him, to whom Chopin dedicated a March of his own composition, is said to have "walked up and down while it was being played, smiling and beating time with the utmost complacency." Some of the artist's letters to his parents, from Berlin, are exceedingly graphic, and we regret that we have not space for a few extracts from them. Wherever he went his playing created quite a sensation; and it is related that whilst waiting for horses at the little town of Züllichau, he opened a pianoforte which he discovered at the post-house, and so attracted his fellow-travellers by his performance that when the horses were ready nobody would stir, the listeners overwhelmed him with praises, and one of the company (probably the town cantor) went close up to Chopin and said, in a voice trembling with emotion, "Sir, I am an old and thoroughly trained musician; I, too, play the piano, and so know how to appreciate your masterly performance; if Mozart had heard it he would have grasped your hand and cried, 'Bravo.' An insignificant old man like myself cannot dare to do so." Chopin travelled much; but his love for his native country never lessened; and the national colouring which distinguishes some of his best pieces gives to them an individuality which might have degenerated into mere mannerism with a lesser genius. In every sense of the word he was a true artist; and the author of the present volume, who was on terms of the greatest intimacy with him, also shows us how kindly and generous was his nature. Had he not become the pet of society, it is possible that he might have done greater things, but he could at least console himself with the conviction that both as an executive and a creative artist he was thoroughly appreciated. Idolised as he was in Paris, where he was said to have "turned the heads of all the ladies," his days passed as in a delicious dream; but it was in this city that the seeds of the disease which so rapidly enfeebled him were sown; and his dearest friends were powerless to prevent the catastrophe which they knew must soon occur. It is difficult to read any accurate account of the career of Chopin without a feeling of melancholy being created; but this latest tribute to his memory is certainly the best yet offered to the public.

Nœnia (Poem by Schiller). For Chorus and Orchestra. Composed by Hermann Goetz (Op. 10). The English version by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, M.A.

When, some short while ago, this work was performed at a concert given by an amateur choral Society, we dwelt at such length upon its character and merits that very little remains now to be said. We could not, however, refuse a formal review to a thing of so much beauty and worth, while the fact is incontestable by anybody who has seen this music, that public attention cannot, in reason, be too persistently demanded for it. Of one thing we are sure, which is that no amateur who heard Goetz's Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," at the initial Concert of the London Musical Society, will fail to turn to the work now before us with eager expectation and high hope. The Cantata is worthy of the Psalm, as the Psalm is worthy of any genius vouchsafed to us in modern times. In both there are surprising power, masterful knowledge of technical means and effect, and that incommunicable and inexplicable something which constitutes the quality of greatness. Alas! that we so early lost this master of music, and did not know what a treasure we possessed till after he had been called to rest from his brief and ill-requited labours. But this, in our art, is the real "old, old story"—one that will probably go on till the end of time.

The Cantata sets out, after a lengthened and most attractive orchestral preamble, with the motto of the whole work, "And the Beautiful must perish," enunciated by the chorus in unaccompanied harmony, and followed by a contrapuntal movement, "What vanquishes men and immortals?" Here the conspicuous freedom with which Goetz wrote under such conditions is fully asserted, but the music is never open to the charge of being merely scholastic. Like a true master, Goetz ever kept in view the highest function of his art as an expression of feeling, and could subordinate all things to it. The chorus closes with a repetition of the "motto," and then a tenor solo, quasi recitativo, followed by another for alto, and yet another for bass, makes reference to a case from classic lore in which no power could redeem the dead from the grave. One is reminded here of the grace and beauty with which Mendelssohn illustrated the tragedies of Sophocles; and, indeed, the whole work proves Goetz to have been no stranger to the form and spirit that composer may be said to have invented in "Antigone." At the close of the recitatives we have a chorus in C sharp minor, "But forth she came from the sea," which is from first to last instinct with charm. It would be impossible for us to convey in mere words an idea of the pure loveliness here found. One thinks of Mendelssohn at his best when reading these pages, while all the time conscious of an element which only Goetz could have supplied. The chorus is long extended, but not too long. We can afford to linger over such beauty, and even then feel regret that "the Beautiful must perish." In due course, the chorus leads directly to a kind of epilogue (also choral), wherein we find consolation for the evanescence of noble and lovely lives. "Yet a death-song upraised by the lips of affection is glorious" sings the poet, adding, "He that is mean and base passes unsung to the grave." Here Goetz draws together all his energies for a supreme effort, and the result is grand. What earnest, exalted and expressive music have we now! It is both strong and tender, like all great things in art. Take, for example, the passage "He that is mean and base," &c., wherein, by the way, we see another reflection of Mendelssohn's spirit. We know but little that is more powerfully true to poetic purport than this, but, indeed, a like observation is applicable to the whole Cantata, which should henceforth be a precious possession in the hands of English amateurs. If it be said that we have written a rhapsody instead of a review, our only answer is, that everybody who makes the acquaintance of this work will admit the inevitableness of a rhapsody, and grant the needlessness of a review.

THE rapid spread of Choral Societies renders the demand for part-music so pressing, that were it not for works like that under notice, the supply must shortly become exhausted. The activity of the firm, however, which has done much to create this want, is not likely to be relaxed now that the result, long aimed at, has been so successfully achieved; and the collection of four-part songs and madrigals contained in Novello's "Part-Song Book" may be always relied on, not only as a library of the best standard part-music by modern composers, but as a vehicle for issuing entirely new works by accredited writers. The nine four-part songs for mixed voices now under review, are here published for the first time. Six, by the Honourable Seymour J. Egerton—with the original German words and an English translation by Mrs. Cary-Elwes—may be cited as most favourable examples of clear and refined writing; and we shall be much surprised if some of these, at least, do not attain the popularity they deserve. No. 1 is a quiet and musicianlike setting of the words, which cannot fail to be effective with a well-trained choir; and, although the same may be said of No. 2, we have in addition several beautiful points—as, for instance, where the phrase, "The white wings of angels shall fan her sweet face," is so tenderly answered by all the voices, from acute to grave, in succession. No. 3, in F minor and major, most sympathetically expresses some very beautiful verses, which—like all those in this set of songs—are so excellently translated as to convey no suspicion of their not being original. We particularly admire the fresh effect of the change into the major on the words "Ten thousand loves;" and the return to the minor throughout is thoroughly in accordance with the feeling of the poetry, a merit not always to be found in compositions of this character. No. 4, in the somewhat unusual key of F sharp major, is exceedingly simple in construction, a good effect being gained in the last four bars by the long holding notes in all the parts, on the words "Heavy moan and sigh." No. 5, although melodious and well written, is scarcely, perhaps, as attractive as the others; but No. 6, "King Winter," which has already appeared in the Musical Times, is full of that quaint and rugged character which the poetry demands. Commencing with a bold subject in A minor, the burst in the relative major on the phrase "Ha! who mocks me, tremble!" with the sudden change to A major, the voices entering in imitation, is extremely effective. The short "Andante," intervening before the return of the joyous subject in the major, and the lingering concluding bars may also be cited as well-considered and artistic points in a song which does infinite credit to its composer. Miss Holland's part-song has already been performed with much success by Mr. Leslie's choir. The due expression of the words has evidently ruled the composer in the performance of her task more than the display of her own powers of elaborate part-writing; and the result is a placid composition which appropriately colours the touching and profound verses of Shakespeare. The harmonies are exceedingly good throughout, and the voice parts carefully and fluently written. Mr. Josiah Booth's quaint setting of Shakespeare's well-known poetry is thoroughly English in character, if we may be allowed to affirm that we have a national individuality. The melodiousness of the subjects, and the happy manner in which the voices respond in the oft-recurring phrases "Hey ding a ding a ding," and "with a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino," will, we are certain, ensure for the song a welcome wherever it is heard. So hearty and spontaneous a composition must appeal powerfully to the many choral bodies in quest of novelty. The last part-song on our list is, we believe, the composition of an American, and is a good example of quiet and unpretending writing. We scarcely know why it should have been printed in $\frac{3}{2}$ time; and fear that, from this cause, it will be difficult to prevent a choir from dragging the second bar of minims; but if it can be kept up to the speed evidently intended by the composer, it cannot fail to prove effective. It is extremely tuneful, and the harmonies are most appropriate throughout. We shall be glad again to meet Mr. Grant in a composition of somewhat ampler dimension.

The Music of the Bible; with an account of the Development of Modern Musical Instruments from Ancient Types. By John Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc., Magd. Coll., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co., and Cassell, Petter and Galpin.)

ALTHOUGH the substance of the contents of this volume is contained in a series of papers contributed by Dr. Stainer to the Bible Educator, so many alterations have been made, the author tells us in his preface, and so much new matter has been added, that the work assumes an importance far beyond that usually attached to mere reprinted articles. The idea of tracing the development of musical instruments from the earliest times through the medium of the Bible is one which, so ably carried out as it is in this work, materially increases the interest of the subject; for, as Dr. Stainer truly says, "the study of the history of ancient nations, whether with reference to their arts, religion, conquests, or language, seems to gather and be concentrated round the Book of Books," and it is better to base our remarks upon so authentic a record than to trust to the mere opinions—very often immaturely considered—even of many of those who have presumedly studied the matter. The various instruments mentioned in Holy Scripture are divided in this work, as a modern orchestra would be divided, into stringed instruments, wind instruments, and instruments of percussion; and the relation they have to kindred instruments of our own time is then enlarged upon. The first instrument spoken of in the Bible is the kinnor, which, although translated harp in our version, seems almost proved to have been a lyre, if we may judge from the aptitude of an instrument of this class for the purposes to which the kinnor was devoted. The continuation of the subject of stringed instruments includes many highly interesting accounts of the ancient harps, of the dulcimer—the name of which is stated to have been probably derived from the Italian—the development of this instrument, gradually into the modern pianoforte, and of the Greek lyre (Kythros); the closing chapter of this portion of the work containing a remark with which we perfectly agree, that "there are but few original progenitors, perhaps indeed only one, of the very large number of stringed instruments now in existence." The chapters on wind instruments contain some valuable information upon the khalil (which was probably an oboe), the various ancient flutes, horns, trumpets, and bagpipes, with a history of the growth of the organ. We have then two chapters devoted to instruments of percussion, so many of which are alluded to in the Old Testament; and the author gives us the origin of the application of the word cembalo to express the pianoforte part in a full score. The final chapter treats of vocal music, and in this we have much important information concerning musical accents and the various scales. Some ancient melodies are also given, one of which, a beautiful plaintive strain, is affirmed by an old Spanish work to be the veritable melody sung by Miriam and her companions. The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has he accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience.

Heitere Musik aus den Werken berühmter Meister, für Pianoforte. Vol. I.
[Leipzig: Bartholf Senff. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Whether or not the anonymous compiler of this volume of pianoforte-arrangements had "forecast" the present gloomy summer with its ever-tearful skies, and its consequent depressing influence on the mind, there can be no doubt, at least, that the publication of a selection of essentially "cheerful music" is just now peculiarly appropriate, and ought to be welcomed on purely psychological grounds alone. And when we add that the selection is throughout a judicious one, representing in twenty-four numbers interesting fragments from the operatic and chamber compositions of classical masters, from Lully, Rameau, and Bach, down to Schubert and Mendelssohn, and that the pianoforte arrangements, while faithfully adhering to the original scores, present no special difficulties to the average performer, we have, we think, said enough to recommend this collection to amateurs desirous of spending an hour now and then in the exhilarating presence of the mirthful manifestations of genius. No attempt is made at a classification, chronological or otherwise, of the numbers chosen, on the principle probably that mirth should be gathered at random. Nevertheless we are of opinion that a somewhat more systematic arrangement would have lent additional attractiveness to a collection of musical pieces embracing some 150 years of the development of the art, and which moreover promises to be followed by other volumes. Thus, the mere indication added to each number of the period during which its composer flourished, would have facilitated the comparison on the part of the art-student of the musical expression given to hilarity during different epochs, while imparting a certain historical significance to the collection. We have the less hesitation in suggesting this real improvement as regards future editions of and additions to the work, since it is so easily supplied. The general "get-up" of this volume of "Heitere Musik" leaves nothing to be desired.

Joyous Spring. Morceau de Salon.
Versailles. Gavotte.
Composed by Michael Watson. [Howard and Co.]

The legato and melodious subject, with the staccato accompaniment, divided between the two hands, which commences the first of these pieces, is in good keeping with the title of the composition; and the subordinate themes—especially that in the subdominant—equally appropriate and effective. A moderately advanced pianist who possesses a trained touch and sympathetic feeling may create a good impression with this unpretentious little sketch. We have often before had occasion to praise Mr. Watson's reproductions of the style of the old dances; and his "Versailles" gives us the opportunity of renewing the expression of our good opinion. He certainly catches the true spirit of the Gavotte; although, perhaps, in the composition before us there is scarcely as much contrast as he has given us in previous pieces of this character. The second theme, in the subdominant, is extremely happy; and the return to the principal subject is not too long delayed.

A New Handbook of Anthems for Public Worship.
[Hodder and Stoughton.]

The intentions of the compilers will perhaps be better understood by our readers if we give the following short quotation from the preface: "Some anxiety is felt by those who think that the music used in public worship should be such only as the whole congregation can sing, lest the introduction of anthems should lead to its being left, partly or wholly, to the choir; and unless the anthems used differ much from those of our cathedrals, all of which were written for choirs, their fear is not groundless. But there is no reason why scripture words should not be so set to music as to be sung freely as hymns." "To provide such music is the object of the present volume."

Some well-known compositions are incorporated in this work, such as Crotch's "Comfort the soul of Thy servant," Goss's "Enter not into judgment," Attwood's "Turn Thy face from my sins;" but for the most part the book is made up of compositions by musicians who are quite new to us. From an artistic point of view these works can scarcely be said to be successful.

Gondoliera. Characteristic Sketch, for piano. By Max Schröter. [J. Scrutton.]

There is a growing fashion in the present day with composers to call their pieces "Elegant" or "Sentimental" (of course with these adjectives translated into French); but really we have never been able to see why such description is needed, for if the compositions have these qualities, there can be no occasion to tell us; and if they have not, assuredly such words upon the title-page cannot strengthen their claims. But Max Schröter, being a foreigner, boldly uses the English language, and declares that his piece is "characteristic"; a totally unnecessary addition, we should imagine, to the title "Gondoliera," the meaning of which is tolerably familiar to all. In this case the piece amply justifies its name, and is moreover an extremely elegant and musicianlike composition. The leading theme certainly owes much of its attractive quality to the persistent figure in the bass with which it is accompanied; but it is graceful, tuneful, and sufficiently suggestive of the subject the piece is presumed to illustrate.

Feuillets d'Album (Op. 83). Composed for the Pianoforte by Stephen Heller. [Ashdown and Parry.]

The refined and artistic compositions of Stephen Heller are real "teaching pieces" for those who desire that their pupils shall cultivate a classical taste for the art; and the trifles before us are a welcome addition to the many works of this class already given to the world by this prolific composer. Of the six pieces in this book, Nos. 1, 2, and 5 will, we think, find especial favour with amateurs. No. 2 is not only extremely melodious, but there is much freshness in the passages contrasting with the opening subject; and No. 5 has a highly attractive theme, which is first given to the right hand, with a staccato arpeggio bass, and afterwards to the left, the accompaniment being transferred to the upper part. All the other numbers are, however, exceedingly effective, and we cordially commend them to the attention of pianists who are sufficiently trained to do them justice.

A Selection of Compositions for the Organ. By Edouard Batiste. [Ashdown and Parry.]

A few of the later numbers of this selection are before us; and our readers will be glad to be informed that when they are known to them they will sustain the already great reputation of the composer. No. 34 is an Offertoire in B minor, and is rather in the "Moto continuo" style. It is brilliant and effective, and only moderately difficult. No. 35 is the same form of composition, in the key of A flat major. It is in the favourite French pastoral style, and decidedly pretty. To our own mind, this style of composition is not well suited for the church. No. 36 calls for no special notice, but No. 37, which is founded on a theme from the Kreutzer Sonata, is a distinctly effective composition. No. 38 is merely a reprint of "See the conquering hero comes," and No. 39 is another example of the secular pastoral style.

Grand Marche Triomphale (Op. 3), for the Organ. By W. Mullineux. [Weekes and Co.]

A good March is by no means an easy form of composition, for excellent and well-known examples of nearly all the available rhythms are to be found in abundance. The first page of the above-named March is not prepossessing, either as to melody or harmony. The consecutive octaves in the second line, between treble and bass, are neither pleasant nor necessary. However, as we proceed we find our interest awakened, though the March becomes more and more military in its character; but, taken as a whole, it contains much that would be very effective under the hands of a skilful player.

The Psalter, or Canticles and Psalms of David, pointed for chanting upon a new principle: with explanations and directions. By the late Stephen Elvey, Mus. Doc.
[James Parker and Co.]

This Psalter is well-known to most choristers, and therefore requires little recommendation. The present eleventh edition contains Dr. Elvey's latest corrections, completed just before his death. Had breath-marks been added, we should not have hesitated to say that this was one of the most excellent and perfect psalters we have, for every shade of accent is provided for by different kinds of type in the printing.

Short Pieces for the Organ. Edited by Dr. Spark.
[Ashdown and Parry.]

Book No. 9 of this work is perhaps not quite up to the usual standard of interest, notwithstanding that S. Wesley's name is included in it. The pieces are short and easy, just suited to those who play the organ for pleasure and not from a more serious motive. Book 10 contains what we suppose will be a popular march by Himmel, an excellent excerpt from Cherubini's "Requiem," and a pleasant-sounding Andante by F. Lachner.

Four Morceaux from Ballet Music in Gluck's Opera "Orpheus." Menuetto Grazioso from "Iphigenia in Aulis" (Gluck). Arranged for the Organ by Herbert S. Oakeley. [Forsyth Bros.]

Sir Herbert Oakeley does good work by helping to make known these movements. They are most elegant and lovely, and the arranger's work is after the model of Charles Hallé's "Pianoforte School"—profusely fingered, and every necessary direction clearly indicated.

Bath's Musical Museum for the Harmonium. [J. Bath.]

This is a collection of short pieces published in small books, and arranged for the above-named instrument. Books 4, 5, and 6 are before us, and are extremely satisfactory, both as to selection and adaptability to the instrument for which they are intended. The pieces are chiefly taken from the pianoforte or orchestral works of classical composers, and are turned to good account in their new form.

Twelve Chant Series for the Te Deum laudamus. Arranged by Neville G. Barnett. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This is a very useful little publication, and will save choirmasters the trouble of arranging suitable chants for this most difficult of all hymns. Most of the chants are familiar to all, so the book can be used without giving much trouble to the most elementary of choristers. May we not suggest that other sets follow this one?

The Canticles of Matins and Evensong. Arranged to Ancient Melodies, with varied harmonies and accompaniments, by the Rev. J. Eckersley, M.A.
[J. Masters and Co.]

This setting is to be commended, and deserves to be known in churches where garnished Gregorians are palatable.

We have much pleasure in directing attention to an exquisitely finished fac-simile of a drawing representing Mozart at the age of eight, seated at the harpsichord, his father leaning over his chair playing on the violin, and his sister singing from a piece of music which she holds in her hand. The lifelike expression of the features in each figure of this family group, and the excessive delicacy of the colouring, render this a highly attractive picture, even apart from the interest attached to the subject; and we have little doubt, therefore, that not only music-lovers but the general public will eagerly possess themselves of so valuable an art-treasure. Being a reproduction of a drawing made from life in Paris by N. Carmontelle, the authenticity of the likenesses may be depended upon; and we sincerely hope that the publishers, Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co., will be amply repaid for their enterprise in issuing so important a contribution to our collections of musical celebrities.

FOREIGN NOTES.

During the recent series of operatic performances given at Leipzig by the company of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, much enthusiasm was created by the production of Handel's Opera "Almira," the earliest of the composer's many similar stage works. "Almira" was written at Hamburg in 1704 to German words by Feustking, and was produced on the Hamburg stage (then the leading one in Germany in operatic matters) in the following year. The successful revival of the work in our days is the more noteworthy as testifying to the vitality possessed by a species of music generally regarded as obsolete. Considering the unique popularity which the works of what may be called Handel's third period, viz., his oratorios, enjoy in this country, it is surprising that no attempt is being made at a similar revival of one or the other of the numerous operas written by him during the earlier part of his career in England.

An Overture, entitled "Rip van Winkle, intended to illustrate Washington Irving's well-known story, the work of a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium, Mr. George W. Chadwick, attracted much attention on the occasion of its performance during one of the recent annual exhibition concerts of that institution.

The manuscript score of an Opera by Haydn, in the composer's own handwriting, has lately been discovered among a quantity of old music which its present owner had acquired for the value of the paper during the sale of the music appertaining to the répertoire of the now extinct Théâtre-Italien of Paris. The Opera is entitled "La vera Costanza," and was composed in the year 1785 for the Imperial Opera at Vienna, but, in consequence of intrigues, it was never performed. The manuscript bears the inscription at its conclusion, "Fine dell' opera. Laus Deo. 1785."

Herr Bitter, the new Prussian Finance Minister, has also a reputation as a musical savant, being the author of biographies of Johann Sebastian Bach and of his gifted sons, as well as of other musico-historical essays.

We extract the following paragraph from the Times of the 21st ult.: "The general congress of the Cecilia Societies of Germany will be held this year at Ratisbon on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of August. The object of these Societies is to effect a reform of the music in the Roman Catholic churches, and to bring it back to the more severe style of which Palestrina and his school are types. It is the usage at these German annual meetings to perform some specimen works, both of the more important and minor kind, of the earlier Church composers; and as the number of singers is always considerable, and all have been well trained, the effect of ensemble, which is one of the great features in these works, is always sure to be well rendered. On the approaching meeting there will be choral services and other performances of Church music both in the forenoons and afternoons of the 5th and 6th of August in the Cathedral of Ratisbon, and the Dominican Church and the Church of St. Emmeran. The chief selection of music of the early composers will be on the afternoon of the 6th."

The ninth Musical Festival of the Middle-Rhine was announced to take place between the days of the 26th and 29th ult. at Mannheim, the occasion coinciding with the fiftieth anniversary of the excellent Musik Verein of that town. Herr Vincent Lachner was to have conducted the performances.

M. Halanzier resigned his functions as director of the Paris Grand-Opéra on the 15th ult., having concluded the performances given under his régime with Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" on the previous day, when he took leave of the personnel of the establishment. His successor, M. Vaucorbeil, inaugurated his new office by a performance of Halévy's "La Juive," in the presence of the President of the Republic and a crowded audience. M. Grévy, on the occasion in question, had a prolonged interview with the new Director, in the course of which he assured him of the lively interest he took in the conduct and prosperity of the leading lyrical stage of France.

The state subventions for the purposes of Fine Arts granted by the French Government amount to the sum of 1,696,700 francs. Of this the Paris Conservatoire receives 254,100 francs; similar institutions at Toulouse and Lyons 5,300 francs, and those at Lille, Dijon and Nantes 4,000 francs. The Concerts Populaires are aided by a subvention of 50,000 francs, while the remainder of the grant is distributed towards the maintenance of various theatrical establishments.

The sale of the interesting and most valuable collection of autographs of M. Benjamin Fillin was opened last month at Paris, and is attracting much attention. The collection includes numerous interesting specimens from the pens of celebrated musicians and composers.

M. Hue, a pupil of M. Réber, was the successful candidate at the annual competition for the Grand Prix de Rome at Paris. M. Hillemacher obtained the second prize, and M. Martybota the distinction of honourable mention, both being pupils of M. Massenet.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik of last month contains an interesting article of a technical character from the pen of Herr Friedrich Grell, and entitled "Vocal Instruction in Elementary Schools."

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna it is proposed during next season to represent on successive evenings, and in chronological order, the whole of Mozart's operatic works.

The second Music Festival of the International Mozart Institution, at Salzburg, took place on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of last month under the direction of Hans Richter, the respective programmes, however, scarcely offering any special feature of interest. A full account of the proceedings will be found in another part of our impression.

The result of the annual public examinations of the Conservatorium of Vienna, which have just terminated, has been a most brilliant one in the instrumental sections, while leaving much to be desired as regards the vocal department, which has been for some years characterised by mediocrity of talent. The fact is in no way attributable to the deficiency of the teaching body, but rather to the existing scarcity of fine voices among the pupils.

M. Joseph Dupont, the director of the Brussels Conservatoire, is setting a good example to the leaders of similar establishments in announcing his intention to institute a series of concerts for the special purpose of introducing to public notice as yet unknown or unpublished works by Belgian composers, as a means of affording encouragement to their efforts and of raising the standard of national art. It is also announced that M. Vieuxtemps, the eminent professor of the violin at the institution referred to, has resigned the post he has held with so much distinction, in consequence of failing health.

M. J. Lemmens, the eminent musical professor, has just founded a music-school at Malines (Belgium), under the style of Ecole de Musique Religieuse, and under the patronage of the Cardinal Archbishop and the Bishops of Belgium. The principal object of the new institution consists in the teaching of Church music in all its branches, embracing organ- and pianoforte-playing as well as theoretical instruction. The high aims put forward in the prospectus which its founder has just issued promise well for the success of the establishment, which will commence its activity in January next.

The Academy of Fine Arts at Lyons has offered a gold medal of the value of 900 francs for the best essay on a theme involving a somewhat comprehensive and elaborate musico-historical study, being no less than an "Etude sur le rôle de mélodie, de l'harmonie, et le rhythme dans la musique en Europe depuis le moyen âge jusqu'à l'époque actuelle." The result, if successful, would unquestionably be an important contribution to the history of the art.

The Municipal Council of Naples has voted a subvention of 200,000 francs, for the support of the San Carlo Theatre of that town.

An Opera by the young Maestro Antonio Scontrino, entitled "Matelda," has met with much success on the occasion of its first performance, last month, at the Theatre dal Verme of Milan.

Madame Albani has, it is stated, accepted a short engagement at the Theatre Pagliano at Florence, the town where she met with her first triumphs. The eminent vocalist will afterwards appear on the operatic stages of Belgium and Holland.

Under the style of "Mendelssohn Choir" a choral society, consisting of men and boys, has just been formed at Auburn (New York) under the direction of Mr. W. C. Richardson.

Slavonic art has sustained a sensible loss by the death on the 29th of June last of Apollinary de Kontski, brother of the eminent pianist, and founder of the Conservatoire at Warsaw, his native town, which institution he conducted till the last. Kontski was born in 1825, and at an early age he began to exhibit great proficiency on the violin. He became a pupil of Paganini, who eventually bequeathed his violin to him as his most gifted disciple. In 1852 he was nominated solo-virtuoso to the Emperor of Russia, which post he retained until 1861, after which period he devoted his talent exclusively to the Warsaw institution. His compositions are of minor importance.

The death is announced in Paris journals of Auguste Barbereau, theoretical musician and Professor of Musical History at the Conservatoire. He was born at Paris in the year 1799, and in 1824 obtained the Grand Prix de Rome with a Cantata entitled "Agnes Sorel." He was also the author of several theoretical works, among which his "Traité théorique et pratique de composition musicale" takes the first rank.

F. M. Ruthart, the author of a very able history of the Munich Opera, died in the Bavarian capital on the 29th of June last.

We have also to record the death of Joseph Schad, pianist and composer of eminence, who died at the age of sixty-seven, at Bordeaux, on the 4th of last month. Schad was born at Steinach, in Bavaria, and under the tuition of the celebrated Aloys Schmidt he became a pianist of European reputation in his time. During the latter period of his life he had fixed his residence at Bordeaux, where he acquired a great and legitimate influence as a teacher. Among his compositions may be mentioned a pianoforte Concerto dedicated to Liszt, and some Nocturnes dedicated to Chopin.

A new Opera by M. Tschaikowski, entitled "Eugen Onagin," the libretto of which is founded upon a romance by Puschkin, was recently performed, for the first time, by the pupils of the Conservatoire at Moscow, under the direction of Herr N. Rubinstein.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Eugène Gigout, at the Trocadéro (July 3): Fugue (Niedermeyer); Marche Religieuse (Gigout); Toccata in F (Bach); Transcription of l'Oratorio de Noël (Saint-Saëns): Scherzo (Lemmens); Larghetto for clarionet (Mozart); Adagio and Allegro for flute and organ (Bach); Tarantelle for flute, clarionet, and pianoforte (Saint-Saëns). CORRESPONDENCE.

FESTIVAL OF THE SALZBURG MOZART INSTITUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Knowing you will be glad to have some account of the special musical treat I am at present enjoying, I send you this sketch of the "Musikfest" given by the Mozartstiftung, in the enchanting spot where the great German composer was born. A truly worthy one for the imaginative and poetically minded Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart to have opened his baby-eyes upon, and wherein first to have beheld the light. As a fitting commencement to the Festival, I went a pilgrimage to the house where he was born, the font whereat he was baptised, and the dwelling in which he lived, loved, and wrote. A gay look of jubilee and bright expectancy pervaded the streets, where long pennons and flags of all colours hung floating from upper windows and reached to ground-floors; while troops of visitors from all parts flocked through the thoroughfares in holiday travelling trim. On the evening of July 17, when the first of the three days' concerts took place, a large company was assembled in the "Aula Academica," where the executants were already stationed in their places on the platform and "ready-tuned." The programme for the evening was admirably well chosen, and consisted of the following selection:—

I. CONCERT.

17. Juli Abends 7 Uhr.

Ouverture zur "Zauberflöte"	W. A. Mozart.
Violinconcert	Seb. Bach.
Herr Hellmesberger, jun.
Arie aus "Idomeneo"	W. A. Mozart.
(Fr. Schuch-Proska, kgl. Kammersängerin aus Dresden.)
Ouverture zu "Manfred"	R. Schumann.
Synfonie (H-moll, unvollendet)	Fr. Schubert.
Arie der Königin der Nacht aus der "Zauberflöte"	W. A. Mozart.
(Frau Schuch-Proska.)
Siebente Synfonie	L. van Beethoven.

The very first chord of Mozart's finest overture served well to announce the supremacy of the famed Vienna Orchestra—so full, so rich, so exquisitely firm and precise in its togetherhood. Herr Hans Richter presided as Conductor; and a more excellent one it has never been my good fortune to hear—though I have heard Michael Costa, Chelard, and Felix Mendelssohn themselves. Herr Richter is not only keenly vigilant and eminently suggestive; he has the secret of quiet but perfect control over his band of instrumentalists, and sways them to his minutest promptings with magic potency. It was a true delight—especially after a long period of suffering from the scorn with which the majority of Italian orchestras treat the marks, "p" or "pp" in passages requiring delicacy and subdued treatment—to hear the softly yet distinctly murmured sounds produced by the bows of the stringed instrumental performers, and the mellifluous breathings of the wind band, where "pianos" were needed.

Equally effective in its way was the strenuous unanimity and energy of the "fortes," where they occurred. In Sebastian Bach's Violin Concerto, for instance, there were accompanying passages of colossal stateliness for double-basses that were given with a vigour unspeakably grand, alternated by others of tender touch that were played with a refinement and smoothness truly fairy-like—so distinct, yet so extremely piano were they. Herr Hellmesberger is a violinist of robust style, peculiarly well suited for the execution of Bach's noble composition. He delivered the passages with delightfully characteristic firmness and fire. Frau Schuch-Proska has a fine clear voice and pure intonation; singing the two Mozart airs allotted to her with beautiful absence of the trembling and unsteadiness which so often mar the beauty of singing in our days. Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," on this first hearing, failed to excite my interest as I had expected, until towards its close; when a strain of mournful and even tragic solemnity seemed music to which the dying Hamlet might have breathed out his last words—"the rest is silence." The first movement of Schubert's unfinished Symphony, contains some charming subjects for the violoncellos and interwoven motivi for the other instruments; but it—like most of this composer's productions—struck me as being somewhat overwrought. Schubert, when he seizes a graceful idea, is apt to repeat and repeat it, to turn and twist it again and again, to reframe and intertwine it, until the ear becomes wearied with a sense of monotony even while taking pleasure in the musical phrases and acknowledging the contrapuntal skill with which they are worked and reworked. Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," with its sublimely poetical slow movement and exquisitely playful scherzo—executed to absolute perfection—closed the first evening's musical feast. The day's enjoyment harmonises well with the evening's entertainment; for a town of choicer loveliness in situation and scenery is rarely to be seen. Placed on the banks of a rapid stream—the river Salzach—surrounded by green heights and distant mountains, well-wooded slopes on which picturesque castles and lordly mansions are perched, shores along which brightly and variously coloured houses range in the neatness and grace of adornment that characterises most German dwellings—this spot forms an endless succession of pictures and charming landscapes, besides affording scope for enchanting drives amid lanes and woodlands.

As a final touch—which would have rejoiced the heart of Walter Scott himself, who knew, none better, that good fare crowns befittingly the enjoyment of nature's romantic scenery and refined art-pleasures—the eating in Salzburg is of the best; trout that would have had Isaac Walton's cordial commendation, chickens delicate and "tender as morning dew" (to use a French gastronome's phrase), with Alpine butter and fresh cream, make each day's repast a feast worthy of the "Musikfest" at night.

On the morning of July 18 there was an open-air entertainment on the Kapuzinerberg, consisting of a four-part song for men's voices, an address delivered by Herr Baumeister [who, I afterwards heard, is a celebrated enactor of "Falstaff"; and who has a grand speaking voice, with fervour of delivery and excellent enunciation], and Mozart's quartett, "Still ist das Meer," better known in England as "Placido è il mar," from "Idomeneo." On reaching the point of the Capucin Hill, where a small summer-house stands, I found an eager crowd assembled; some in the full blaze of the sunshine, under parasols and umbrellas, some seeking scraps of shade skirting the inclosure, some clustering beneath the adjoining trees, and a fortunate few on a rickety wooden bench under the eaves of a woodcutter's cottage near the spot. On this bench sat an old lady and a young one; who, perceiving an involuntary glance of longing from me, after toiling up the ascent, got up, and in pretty maidenly words of attempted English, that apologised for the roughness of the wooden accommodation, offered me her seat. I had hardly accepted, with a compliment upon her speaking English so well and her amiable courtesy, when some of the Festival Committee gentlemen came to my sister Sabilla and myself, asking us to enter the summer-house, which had the peculiar interest of being the actual spot in which Mozart composed his opera of "Die Zauberflöte."

It is fitted up with exact models of the table at which he wrote, and of the chair in which he sat when occupying this summer-house; its walls are hung round with pictures, photographs, and innumerable tributary wreaths, fastened by ribbon pendants embroidered in gold, bearing the names of various musical Societies in different parts of Germany who have sent these tokens of Mozartian homage to this shrine. On the table lay an open Mozart album in which we were requested to inscribe our names, as the daughters of Vincent Novello who, exactly half a century ago,—this very month—in the July of 1829—came to Salzburg to convey to Mozart's sister (then in failing health and means) a sum of money subscribed by the musical professors of London as a testimony of their admiration for the great composer's genius and of their sympathy with his sister in her declining age. Strangely moving was it to stand beneath the little summer-house roof, looking forth upon the very mountains and woods and river and picturesque town that Mozart beheld when he raised his eyes from his manuscript; strange to sit in the chair he occupied, listening to the strains he composed; strange to be in the very place where, fifty years since, my own father had come to visit the birthplace of his favourite composer and the spot which had witnessed the birth of some of that composer's finest compositions.

With reverential humility we complied with the committee's request, and placed in the Mozart-Album our photographs and the following inscriptions:—

I pray you, let us satisfy our eyes [and ears]
With the memorials and the things of fame
That do renown this city.
Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, Act iii., Scene 3.

Salzburg, July 18, 1879.

The selection for the second evening's Concert was as follows:—

II. CONCERT.

18. Juli, Abends 7 Uhr.

Ouverture (Nr. 3) zu "Leonore" ... ... L. van Beethoven.
Concert für zwei Claviere ... ... W. A. Mozart.
(Brüder Louis & Willi Thern aus Pest.)
Vorspiel zum 3. Akte der "Meistersinger" ... R. Wagner.
Arie aus der Oper "Die Hochzeit des Figaro" ... W. A. Mozart.
(Frau Schuch-Proska.)
Violinconcert ... ... L. van Beethoven.
(Herr Concertmeister Grün aus Wien.)
Sachsens Monolog aus dem 2. Akte der "Meistersinger," "Was duftet doch der Flieder" ... R. Wagner.
(Herr Opernsänger Dr. Krauss.)
Synfonie in Es ... ... W. A. Mozart.

The performance of the third Overture that Beethoven wrote for his opera of "Fidelio" under the name of "Leonore," was absolutely faultless. The precision and perfect ensemble of this Viennese orchestra are wonderful; and the effect produced, when they play compositions of such extreme elaboration and difficulty as this one, is consummately gratifying to the musical sense. The brothers Thern played with great delicacy of execution and perfectly in the style of the master's composition they gave. Herr Richter conducted Wagner's "Vorspiel" with truest spirit of course; and the executants he marshalled were implicit ministers to his will. Frau Schuch-Proska so completely delighted her audience by the mode in which she sang Mozart's enchanting recitative and air, "Deh vieni" that she was encored; but I own to having heard it sung with far more sentiment and charm by other singers I could name. Herr Grün's execution of Beethoven's Violin Concerto was a masterly piece of manual dexterity and finished performance, and elicited liveliest applause. The imaginative and characteristically treated "Monolog" by Wagner had a very efficient interpreter in Dr. Krauss; whose magnificent voice and fine declamation gave full effect to this piece; while the matchless way in which it was accompanied held the hearer's breath suspended with interest and admiration. It is a piece of music that makes one feel one ought to hear it many times ere properly understanding and appreciating its entire poetic intention. Mozart's exquisite E flat Symphony made a fitting climax to the entertainment on this occasion.

Owing to the indisposition of two of the ladies who were to have taken part in the third day's programme, it was modified as follows:—

III. CONCERT.

19. Juli, Morgens 11 Uhr.

1. Streichquartett in C-dur ... ... W. A. Mozart.
(Die Herren Philharmoniker: Grün, Hofmann, Zöllner, Giller.)
2. Drei Lieder (a) "Ewige Liebe" ... ... J. Brahms.
" " (b) "Im Herbst" ... ... Robert Franz.
" " (c) "Liebesglück" ... ... J. Sucher.
(Herr Dr. Krauss.)
3. Andante und Variationen für zwei Claviere ... Rob. Schumann.
(Brüder Thern.)
4. Duett aus "Don Juan" ... ... W. A. Mozart.
(Frau Schuch-Proska, Dr. Krauss.)
5. (a) Minuten-Walzer ... ... Chopin.
(b) Türkischer Marsch ... ... L. van Beethoven.
(Fur zwei Claviere (Brüder Thern.)
6. Zwei Lieder (a) "Mondnacht" ... ... Rob. Schumann.
" " (b) "Frühlingslied" ... ... Mendelssohn.
(Frau Schuch-Proska.)
7. Clavier-Quintett, Op. 44 ... ... Rob. Schumann.
(Die Herren Louis Thern, Grün, Hofmann, Zöllner, Giller.)

With thorough refinement Mozart's Quartett in C major was executed by the four "Philharmoniker" gentlemen; and then came a group of three entrancing "Lieder," one more exquisite than the other, sung to perfection by Dr. Krauss, whose fine manly tone and rich voice are equalled by his taste and feeling in expression. These Lieder were accompanied by Herr Hans Richter, whose delicacy and skill in accompanying vie with his consummate excellence as a conductor. He not only played the elaborately difficult accompaniments to these three Lieder with the polish and mastery of a concerto-player, but he gave enchanting effect to the dainty brilliancies of those to Mozart's duet from "Don Juan," and to Schumann's "Mondnacht," and Mendelssohn's animated "Frühlingslied," in each of which last Frau Schuch-Proska distinguished herself by beautifully characteristic vocalisation. She was in even better voice than on the two preceding occasions, and sang really charmingly. Schumann's two glorious compositions, the "Andante und Variationen," and Quintett, were given in pre-eminent style, and completed the intense satisfaction with which this truly delightful "Salzburger Musikfest" was enjoyed by

FOURTHS TO OLD CHANTS, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I was "guilty" of a lack of precision in the reference to Drs. Aldrich and Turner, on p. 301, col. 2. But "C. E. K." could hardly understand me as asserting that those masters never wrote any fourths to a bass? The remark obviously applied to such fourths as that inserted by Rimbault in the fifth measure of Chant 23: viz., E in the alto, over B bass, making a modern inversion of the dominant seventh.

This is not the chord of 6-4-2, which your correspondent commends, but of 6-4-3, which Handel never wrote, and every church-musician should eschew.

Dr. Crotch, in his "Elements," says, "The fundamental note Sol . . . is peculiar to modern music. Handel, Corelli, and other composers of the same period with them, avoided fourths to the bass note as much as possible, and wrote this discord as an inversion of the dissonant triad."

Dr. Callcott, in his "Grammar," writes to the same effect, and remarks on "the want of melody in the intermediate parts where the fourth is inserted."

Canon Havergal, in his Preface to Ravenscroft, observes: "The chord of 6-4-3, which is hardly a century old, is not, of course, in any of the tunes. Purity of ecclesiastical style forbids its use, though so many modern composers inconsiderately introduce it."

I trust that "C. E. K." will now see my intention. I cannot follow him into the wide subject of fourths in general.

While I have the attention of your readers, will you kindly allow a few remarks supplementary to the article above alluded to.

I omitted to notice that Dr. Dupuis' "Second Set of Chants" contains a Double in D, which Bennett and Marshall, and others, wrongly attribute to the Hon. J. Spencer. It is correctly assigned by Goss, No. 85; but the bass should not be thrown up to the higher octave in the second strain: this makes it rise above the original tenor. There are two chants by Dupuis, in Vandernan, which are not contained in either of the sets published by the Doctor himself.

In 1834 Mr. Jonathan Gray, of York, published "Twenty-four Chants: to which are prefixed Remarks on Chanting." Folio. The remarks are interesting, as showing the diversity of use in the various cathedrals at that time. I have not observed any of the chants in other collections, but I remember hearing one in Lancashire some years ago.

"The National Psalmist," a folio volume, chiefly of new music, was edited by Charles Danvers Hackett in 1840.

It contains thirty-eight chants, mostly contributed by living authors; but a few are to be found in Langdon and Beckwith.

"A Collection of Single and Double Chants, adapted to the Psalms," was published by Edmund Lacon Farr (1841). It contains ninety-two compositions, many of which, by Dr. Buck, Dr. Bexfield, T. Adams, &c., seem to be printed for the first time.

Professor Walmisley, of Cambridge, edited a collection of chants, but, not having a copy, I was not able to describe it. I looked through it some years ago, and it did not appear to be of much interest. I think I noticed that several chants were incorrectly given, and others wrongly assigned.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours, Vicarage, Yoxford, July 4, 1879. Henry Parr.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I continue to receive daily inquiries on the subject of my letter to The Musical Times—some of such inquiries, by-the-bye, being somewhat wide of the mark—as to large church-organs and the like; and I shall be glad, therefore, to take the opportunity of publicly answering those whose requirements are similar to my own, viz., the means of blowing a small or moderate-sized organ in a private house.

Where a sufficient continuous water-pressure is available, the convenience and admitted success of hydraulic engines would secure the preference, though the cost of the water supply is sometimes very great. Steam has been found to be inconvenient. Of gas-engines there were till lately but two sorts in anything like general use—one very noisy, the other noiseless, but too complicated to be worked without skilled assistance. The little engine, however, I have secured, a £25 "Bisschop" (one-man power), is simple in its construction and very nearly noiseless, and I can therefore recommend it; especially as Mr. Durham, of 23, Leadenhall Street, the agent in London, is practically acquainted with organ work.

The details of attachment and working are as follows: The organ in my house is in a dining-room with a basement room under; in the latter the engine is placed on a prepared bed of shavings and sawdust; not fixed, its weight keeping it in position; and as it is very small, I have it further inclosed in a rough cupboard with double sides filled with sawdust: so inclosed, vibration and noise are reduced to a minimum. Ventilation is provided to the outer air and the exhaust pipe carried through the wall (or could have been into a chimney). The lower room being well ventilated the smell is very slight, and in the room above neither smell nor noise can be detected. The engine can be regulated to different rates of speed, but not with the nicety of a water-engine, so a certain amount of over-blowing is unavoidable. I have therefore a second bellows in the basement-room with a wind-trunk communicating with the upper bellows, the trunk containing a valve to prevent return; the over-blowing is therefore below, and above the wind is delightfully steady.

The engine requires warming for ten minutes before using; oiling also, and will then run without attention for a long evening. No "assistant organist," no unsteady blowing, and no creaking of bellows!

The engine power could be detached from the organ and used for domestic purposes, e.g., pumping, lathe-turning, &c.—Yours faithfully,

J. W. Billinghurst.

FREE CONCERTS FOR THE PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It occurs to me that some of your readers who are musical might be willing to give help occasionally in concerts for working people in the poorer districts of London.

The Kyrle Society, established for the purpose of bringing natural and artistic beauty to the homes of the people, has among its various branches a choir of volunteer singers, who meet to practise regularly for the purpose of giving free concerts in the poorest districts of London. Every winter this choir gives performances of oratorios in churches, chapels, and mission halls, as well as miscellaneous concerts in school-rooms; and it is occasionally assisted by the very kind help of eminent professional and amateur soloists.

In the summer evenings performances of open-air music in a garden or playground have been given, to the evident pleasure of the listeners.

But the demands upon the choir are more numerous than it can meet, and if other musical Societies would put themselves in communication with the Kyrle Society, and occasionally undertake a concert for the poor, the good work would be greatly multiplied.

Individual singers who would help in the choir would be gladly welcomed by the Kyrle Society, as the choir needs strengthening. The choir is under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson.

Any singers willing to help, either regularly in the choir or occasionally in the performances, are invited to put themselves in communication with Miss Leycester, Hon. Secretary, 14 Nottingham Place, W., from whom they will learn full particulars as to the dates of practice, place of meeting, and music to be performed.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

July 11, 1879. M. Hill.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

J. K.—Even if the view which you state be held to be correct, it would seem to be more proper to sing the verses of the Te Deum which you quote forte than mezzo-forte. There is certainly no reason for singing them piano. They may not express our own praise, but they do express praise which is continually being offered with ours, and to which we refer with exultation.

Paolo Eruino.—Liszt has definitively declined to again appear as a public performer in England.

Joseph Kindon.—The question should be addressed to a singing master.

A. F. F.—Will be answered in our next number.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ampleforth, York.—The Concert in connection with the annual Exhibition Day was given by the professors and students in the Study Hall on the 16th ult., under the direction of Herr P. von Tuggener, Professor of Music at the College. The concert was a most delightful one in every respect, and elicited from the numerous company the warmest plaudits and several encores. A Commemoration March, by Scotson Clark, and Weber's Jubilee Cantata occupied the first part of the programme. The second portion was miscellaneous, and included compositions by Professor Tuggener.

Banbury.—At Mr. G. A. Hardacre's tenth and last Organ Recital at the Parish Church, he was presented with a purse and silver salver, on which was engraved, "Presented with a purse of fifty sovereigns to G. A. Hardacre, on his leaving Banbury, by the Vicar and congregation of St. Mary's, and other friends, as a mark of their personal esteem and appreciation of his musical talent. June 28, 1879."

Beckenham.—An interesting Meeting was held in the Schools on Monday evening, the 15th ult., when the boys of the Parish Church choir were publicly examined in musical knowledge in the presence of a number of friends. The Rector, Rev. W. L. Cator, presided, and introduced Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, who had volunteered to conduct the examination. The boys have been taught music on the Tonic Sol-fa system by the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Sydney F. Coles, F.C.O. Each boy underwent five individual tests, of musical memory, time, tune, musical ear, and sight-singing, and their successful performance was greeted with applause. The Rector concluded with a vote of thanks to Mr. Curwen, which was heartily carried.

Benhilton, Sutton, Surrey.—On the 8th ult., an Amateur Concert was held in the School-room, in aid of the funds of the Parish Church, All Saints'. An interesting programme was provided, and rendered throughout most satisfactorily. The first part was devoted to sacred music, the chief items worthy of notice being Mozart's "Gloria" (Twelfth Mass) and "Ave Verum," the latter especially being artistically rendered, and Spohr's "As pants the hart," the solo being well sung by Miss Williams. Mr. Detmar and Mr. Hyslop were also very successful. "Ti Prego" (Curschmann) was effectively rendered by Miss Williams, Miss Ball, and Mr. Detmar. The second part commenced with Beethoven's Overture, Egmont, arranged as a pianoforte duet, well played by Mr. Sharp and Mr. Ward. The trio, "O memory" (Leslie), by Miss Place, Mr. Ball, and Mr. Hyslop, was well received and encored, as were many of the songs. The choir sang several part-songs with good expression, reflecting great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Sharp, the organist of the church. Mr. Ward was an able accompanist.

Berwick-on-Tweed.—The nineteenth Annual Festival of Parochial Choirs in connection with the Durham Diocesan Church Choral Association took place in the Parish Church on Tuesday, the 15th ult., on which occasion the choir consisted of about 400 voices. The movement was originated in 1860 by Mr. T. Rees Evans, and annual meetings have since been held in the diocese, the centre of attraction every fourth year being the Cathedral Festival. The great good derived from these meetings was fully shown by the steady chanting of the psalms and canticles, the precision with which the five-part anthem was executed, and the careful attention to light and shade in the rendering of the metrical tunes. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. H. Clementi Smith, M.A., late Precentor in Manchester Cathedral; the lessons being read by the Rev. T. Procter, M.A., Vicar of Tweedmouth, and the Ven. Archdeacon of Lindisfarne; and the sermon preached by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Edinburgh. Mr. Alfred Heap, Organist to the Right Hon. the Earl of Home, presided at the organ; and Mr. Rees à Becket Evans, Organist of the Episcopal Church, Melrose, officiated as Conductor.

Eastbourne.—The Orchestral Concerts now taking place at the Royal Pavilion are unquestionably the best that have ever been given. The new Conductor, Mr. Julian Adams, who earned so much fame both as a director of the orchestra and a pianist at the Pavilion, Buxton, has been engaged, and under his supervision the selection and rendering of the music have delighted every lover of the art. The inaugural concert to celebrate the opening of the Park season was well attended, and the season promises to be a most prosperous one.

Faversham.—Mr. C. D. Hobday gave a most successful Concert of Classical Chamber Music, on Thursday evening, June 26, at the Institute, under the patronage of Lady Sondes and Lady Harris. The following artists were engaged: vocalist, Miss Florence Norman, R.A.M.; pianoforte, Mrs. Bucknall-Eyre, R.A.M.; first violin, Herr A. Kummer; second violin, Mr. E. B. Norman; viola, Herr Weber, and violoncello, Mr. Joseph Norman. The programme was well selected and admirably rendered.

Frome.—The new organ, recently erected in Holy Trinity Church by Messrs. Allen, of Bristol, was opened on the 22nd ult. The organ is in a neat yet handsome pitch-pine case. There are three double-action composition pedals to great organ, and two to swell. The compass of the pedal-board is 2½ octaves, that of the sound-board 5½ octaves—so that, by drawing the two pedal stops and the octave, the effect of four stops is produced. The choral service, during which Mr. J. Davis Cox presided at the organ, was well rendered, the choir giving evidence of Mr. Cox's careful training. The service was read by the Rev. W. E. Daniel, vicar, and the lessons by the Rev. G. F. De Gex, vicar of Christ Church, and the Rev. G. Boodle, of Cloford. The preacher was the Rev. W. Tait, of Tavistock. After the sermon Mr. W. H. Cox gave a recital upon the organ, which was well calculated to display the beauties of the instrument.

Handsworth, near Birmingham.—The second Annual Festival Service of the Lichfield Diocesan Gregorian Choral Association was held at St. Michael's Church, on Thursday, the 17th ult. The choir numbered 280 voices, and was composed of the choirs of All Saints, Christ Church, St. John's, and St. Andrew's, West Bromwich; St. Andrew's and Christ Church, Wolverhampton; St. Augustine's Mission Church, Stafford; St. Anne's, Derby; Wilmcote, Walton, Amblecote, St. Matthew's, Smethwick, and some members of St. Michael's, Handsworth. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Honorary Organist to the Association, presided at the organ. The service-book contained the new arrangements of the first tone to the Magnificat, and of the fifth tone to the Nunc dimittis—the former by Mr. Warwick Jordan, the latter by the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard; both specially written for the occasion. Considering that there had been only one joint rehearsal, the Plain-Song and Harmony Choirs sang together with wonderful precision, under the conductorship of Mr. Frederick W. Williams, the Honorary Secretary. Altogether the service was very successfully rendered.

Kelvedon.—A new clock, with Cambridge chimes, having been set up in the tower of the Parish Church, a Festival Service was held on Friday afternoon, the 4th ult., which attracted a crowded congregation. The choir of the church was augmented for the occasion by members of the choir of the Temple Church and St. Paul's, Regent's Park, Mr. Worsley Staniforth presiding at the organ. The service was Bunnett in F; the Anthem, Sterndale Bennett's "God is a Spirit;" Kent's "Blessed be Thou" being sung at the conclusion of the service. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Sir John C. Hawkins, Bart., Canon of St. Albans' Cathedral.

Leeds.—On the 15th ult., at the Town Hall Organ Recitals, Dr. Spark devoted the whole of his programme to the works of the late Henry Smart. The selection was excellent; and we need hardly say that the friend of thirty years did full justice to the works of the deceased. The most interesting number was a Postlude in E flat, written for the Organist's Quarterly Journal, and the last composition of Mr. Smart. It is a clever and musicianlike work, and of such elaboration that a first hearing would hardly justify a critical analysis. Instead of playing an Allegretto set down in the programme, Dr. Spark appropriately played a hymn written by the late composer, which was listened to with much attention by the large audience assembled.

Navan.—The Ninth Festival of the Meath Church Choral Association was held on the 24th of June in the Parish Church. The choirs present were Trim, Athboy, Slane, Kells, Navan, Ardbraccan, Kentstown, Paynestown, Rathmolyon and Agher, in addition to several individual members of other choirs. Before the service, the hymn "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven," was sung to Dr. Gauntlett's tune. The Venite was sung to a single chant by Sir F. Ouseley, the 107th Psalm to a cycle of four chants by Mr. Young, of Lincoln, and the 121st Psalm to a Chant in E by Mr. Barnby. The Te Deum was Tours in F, and the Anthem, Sir G. Elvey's "O give thanks." The Kyrie was taken from Dr. Steggall's Service in G, and the Introit from Sir R. Stewart's Service in the same key. The Jubilate was sung to a fine double chant by Sir. J. Goss. The singing of the united choirs was very satisfactory throughout, the various leads in the Anthem and Te Deum being taken up with precision. The sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Nugent, Chaplain to the Bishop of Meath. Mr. W. H. Gater, Mus. Bac., Choirmaster to the Association, presided at the organ.

New Mill, near Huddersfield.—On Sunday, the 6th ult., special Services were held in the Parish Church, and collections made in behalf of the Day and Sunday schools. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. E. Brownrigg, Vicar of Shelley, and in the evening by the Rev. C. A. Hulbert, Vicar of Almondbury and Hon. Canon of Ripon Cathedral. The musical portion of the services was rendered very efficiently under the direction of Mr. C. E. Holmes, Organist and Choirmaster, who presided at the organ. The Anthem in the morning was "It came even to pass," Sir F. A. G. Ouseley; and the Jubilate was sung to Dr. John Smith's (Dublin) setting in B flat. In the evening, the Anthem was Handel's air, "Praise the Lord with cheerful noise" (Esther), and the Chorus "Fixed in His everlasting seat" (Samson). The solo vocalist was Miss Annie Jenkinson. The chorus was sung with great precision and effect. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were taken to Sir R. P. Stewart's setting in G. At the close of the evening service Beethoven's "Hallelujah Chorus," from the Mount of Olives, was sung. The hymns at both services were special, and the tunes included two new ones by the Organist, which were especially well rendered.

Newport, Essex.—On Thursday, the 17th ult., the Annual Festival of the North-West Essex Choral Association was held in the Parish Church. The choirs numbered about two hundred voices. Mr. Worsley Staniforth, the Choirmaster to the Association, presided at the organ. The Responses were sung to Tallis's music; the Psalms in the morning being taken to Gregorian tones, and those in the afternoon service to Anglican chants. Mr. Warwick Jordan's arrangement of the Fifth Tone was used for the Te Deum, and the Anthem was Sir John Goss's "O give thanks." An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Edgar Smith, of Highgate. The festival was in every respect a great success.

North Berwick, N.B.—Mr. Frank Bates, Organist of St. Baldred's Church, gave an Organ Recital on Monday, the 14th ult. The programme included Bach's Fugue in G, and selections from Handel, Mendelssohn, Smart, Guilmant, &c.

Sherborne.—The forty-ninth Commemoration Concert was given on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., by the School Musical Society in the new school-room. The programme was an ambitious one, but its success was quite equal to its aim. Part I. opened with two movements from Beethoven's Symphony in C, performed by the school orchestra, assisted by eminent artists from London. This was followed by Mendelssohn's Cantata Praise Jehovah, which by its massive breadth and the prominent part taken in it by the chorus was the best possible work that could have been selected for the occasion. In this the school chorus highly distinguished itself under the able conducting of Mr. Louis N. Parker. The solos were all sung by members of the choir.

Sydney.—The programmes of the Concerts given by the University Musical Society and the Sydney Musical Union, under the direction of Herr Josef Kretschmann, are models of what classical concerts should be. The attendances at the performances have been uniformly good; and there is little doubt that the continuance of these Associations is earnestly to be desired by all who wish to aid in the spread of high-class music.

Tenbury.—The members of the Musical Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah in the Corn Exchange, on Thursday, June 26, which was numerously attended. The principal parts were taken by Mrs. Caldicott, Miss M. E. Pound, Mr. Fredricks, of Hereford Cathedral, and Mr. Thorndike. The choral singing was most satisfactory; the points were firmly taken up, and every difference of light and shade carefully observed. The performance was materially assisted by a small orchestra led by Mr. E. G. Woodward, of Gloucester. The concerted pieces were well sung by members of the Society.

Tenby.—A Masonic Festival Service was held at St. Mary's Church on Thursday, the 10th ult. The choral portions of the service were sung by the church choir, assisted by Masons, numbering thirty-eight voices. Throughout the service they sang well together, in good time and perfect tune, and with a very commendable attention to light and shade. The responses were sung to Tallis's festival setting, and the special psalms to Gregorian tones by the boys' and men's voices alternately. The Cantate Domino was sung to an old cathedral double chant of Dr. Woodward's, and the Deus misereatur to a single one by J. Barnby. The Anthem was Gounod's "Send out Thy light," which was on the whole well sung. Previous to the commencement of the service Mr. Armstrong played an excellent selection of music. A collection was made at the close towards masonic and local charities, which amounted to nearly £10.

Woolwich.—The Rev. T. Tuffield, assisted by Miss Marian Williams (Gold Medalist R.A.M.), Miss Martha Harries, R.A.M., and a number of friends, gave a Concert at the Town Hall, on the 2nd ult., to a large and appreciative audience. Miss Williams created quite an enthusiasm by her splendid singing, and Miss Harries shared the honours of the evening with her, both ladies receiving several encores. The choir sang in a finished style, under the leadership of the Rev. T. Tuffield.

Worcester.—The Members of the Worcester Madrigal Society, conducted by the Rev. E. V. Hall, Precentor of the Cathedral, gave a very successful Concert on the 8th ult. in aid of the Restoration Fund of St. Helen's Church. The programme included several specimens of madrigals ancient and modern. Mr. Crane and Mr. Dyson, both of the Cathedral choir, contributed solos—Handel's "Nasce al bosco," Beethoven's "Adelaida," and a song, "The Brooklet," by the Conductor.

The name of Miss Louie Wood, who gave a Concert at Crayford, noticed in our last number, was printed, by mistake, Nova.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Hamilton Robinson, R.A.M., Organist and Choirmaster to Brunswick Chapel, Hyde Park, W.—Mr. Sidney Hall, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's Church, Hurst, near Ashton-under-Lyne.—Mr. Edwin Allwright, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Katherine Cree, Leadenhall Street, E.C.—Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of All Saints', Reading.—Mr. William L. R. McCluer, Organist and Choirmaster to Rains Episcopal Chapel, Homerton.—Mr. Alfred Long, Organist and Choirmaster to the Chapel of the Rolls, Chancery Lane.—Mr. T. Martin Channon, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, Knightsbridge, S.W.—Mr. Frederick E. Lucy Barnes to Trinity Church, New York.—Mr. P. R. THE PSALTER AND CANTICLES

POINTED AND SET TO ACCOMPANYING

CHANTS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

By the Rev. SIR H. W. BAKER, Bart., and

WILLIAM HENRY MONK,

Professor of Vocal Music in King's College, London.

The Cheap Edition, with Vocal Score (Gregorians in unison), is now ready; size, double post 16mo.

Limp cloth, cut flush, and lettered ... ... 2s. 0d.
Cloth boards, turned in, and lettered ... ... 2s. 6d.
Cloth boards, turned in, gilt lettered, red edges ... 3s. 0d.

A large Imperial 8vo Edition, with accompanying harmonies for the Gregorian Tones, is in the Press.

The distinctive object aimed at is to unite under the same pointing two forms of chant hitherto considered incompatible—the Ancient and the Modern, the Gregorian and the Anglican—and to introduce a new form of Chant, which is commended with confidence for the use of Parish Choirs.

The work includes about 50 varieties of the Gregorian Chants, some from sources not easily accessible; and about 390 chants of the Anglican form, of which 100 are more or less well known, the remainder having been composed expressly for this work by musicians of distinction, including most of our Cathedral Organists.

Canticles only, 6d., 9d., and 1s.

Tonic Sol-fa and Plain Song Editions will be published as soon as possible.

NEW WORK BY MR. CURWEN.

MUSICAL THEORY

BY JOHN CURWEN.

Published this day, complete in cloth, price 3s. 6d. The work consists of five Sections: Time and Tune, The Minor Mode and Transition, Expression, Musical Form, and Harmony. All the musical examples are given in the Staff Notation as well as the Tonic Sol-fa.

The Orchestra says: "We can only stop to allude to the symmetrical and systematic arrangements of the subjects discussed in this book; to the excellent way in which essential principles and facts are prominently put forward; and to the interesting comments and elucidations which supplement the main definitions."

The Saturday Musical Review says: "The sonata form is particularly well treated, and the book throughout is very pleasant reading, and exhibits on almost every page the earnestness of the writer."

The Musical Times says: "The remarks upon Sections, Phrases, Periods, Strains, and Movements are extremely lucid; and much information may be gained by the student from a careful observation of the manner in which the various specimens given are built up."

NOTICE TO THE PROFESSION.—Teachers of Music are invited to apply for a specimen copy of "MUSICAL THEORY," which will be sent to them at half-price post-free (1s. 9d.) during the month of August. A remittance in stamps or P.O.O. should accompany each order.

EIGHTY MUSICAL SENTENCES

TO ILLUSTRATE CHROMATIC CHORDS

BY G. A. MACFARREN, M.A., MUS. DOC.,

Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.

Third Edition, now ready, price 3s.

The Monthly Musical Record says: "These concise strains, ranging in length from four to forty bars, not only serve to display to view a complete list of the chords most generally in use (and, we might add, some others), but at the same time exemplify their natural and most useful application; and this plan is carried out in a far more inviting, more convincing, and more impressive manner than is generally to be found in instruction books."

Catalogue of Music in the Staff Notation, comprising Theoretical Works, Cantatas, Sacred and Secular Choruses, Anthems, Glees, and Part-Songs sent post-free to any address.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorals and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

"Cleverly and effectively written."—Morning Post.

"Dr. Pole has here achieved a work upon which he may fairly be congratulated. His combination of the metrical and ordinary versions of the text seems to us quite happy, and is well carried out, while the music presents the solidity and learning necessary to success in any composition of the sort. The motett, finely sung, elicited warm applause."—Daily Telegraph.

"An effective not less than an ingenious composition; remarkably interesting; much applauded. We trust that opportunity will be afforded of hearing it again and again."—Musical Times.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875 & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press :—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE.

"A. FETIS,

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany.)"

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

MOZART AS A PIANOFORTE COMPOSER.

By H. Heathcote Statham.

We hear very little at present of Mozart's pianoforte music beyond an occasional performance of the D minor Concerto, the work in which he reached his highest point as a composer for the instrument, and which is almost the only one still considered an attraction in a classical programme framed on modern ideas. So far as concert-room performances are concerned, there may be a practical deficiency urged against many of his pianoforte compositions, as unfitted to elicit the tone and effect of a modern piano in such a way as to enable it to compete successfully with the larger scale of the modern orchestra. This objection cannot apply, however, with equal force to his chamber music for pianoforte solo, where sonority is not of essential consequence; at all events the disqualification would apply equally to the gavottes and suites of Bach, the former of which at least are frequently played and listened to by amateurs of the most advanced views without any sense of anachronism, rather with virtuous consciousness that they are doing the correct thing. But the effacement of Mozart's pianoforte music in drawing-rooms seems for the present to be almost complete. Amateurs of classical tastes have their favourite bits of Schumann and Grieg for chance contribution to social musical enjoyment; and to play a rondo or a set of variations by Mozart in an æsthetic circle would require a certain degree of courage and independence, even when set off by an apology for an antiquated and unfashionable taste.

To the musician of course all that Mozart has done is of importance; though it would seem that even professed musical students have in many cases allowed this portion of his work to drop out of sight a good deal. Beyond their circle, and among the now very numerous ranks of more or less intelligent amateurs, the present fashion in music appears to preclude any knowledge of it at all. Yet even putting aside the purely musical interest and beauty of these works, they fill a much more important place in the history of pianoforte music than is generally assumed, when we consider that the modern pianoforte actually came into existence in the course of Mozart's career, and that he was therefore the earliest composer of the highest order who could do anything towards forming a style for the instrument.

Had the composer's life been prolonged for ten or fifteen years it is not improbable that he would have fully achieved the formation of a complete pianoforte style, suited to the genius and capabilities of the instrument, and totally distinct from the old harpsichord and clavier style. The power of the instrument for passionate expression and breadth of effect is unmistakably illustrated in the first movement at all events of the D minor Concerto, and still more unmistakably in isolated passages in the pianoforte sonatas and variations for chamber performance. But it must inevitably have been a long business for a composer who had been brought up from infancy as a player in the old harpsichord style to get rid of its trammels, even under the suggestive influence of an instrument with new capabilities of expression; and if we take his pianoforte music in the mass, it must be admitted that the epithet "old-fashioned" is fairly applicable to a considerable proportion of it when regarded from the modern point of view. The ornaments, turns, and twitterings with which the older school of harpsichord writers endeavoured to conjure expression out of an expressionless keyboard, are still retained in much of his music in almost their original exuberance, though the need for such picturesque impertinences had passed away with the introduction of the "forte-piano" action. The long shake on the penultimate note of a full cadence, accompanied by arpeggios of the usual sequence of harmony, is a mannerism occurring over and over again, and imparts a disagreeably mechanical effect to some of what are otherwise his most graceful movements; and it is, in fact, difficult to reconcile the frequent employment of so trite a resource with the evidences of boldly original thought and treatment which we meet with in special cases. But very likely the real explanation is to be found in the fact that to many of these published pianoforte works the composer himself attached little value; they were probably in many cases written currente calamo, and mainly as "pot-boilers." It is obvious from the records in his life and letters that his great works for the pianoforte were his extempore performances, in which he could indulge not only his own genius, but any peculiar power of treatment of the keyboard of which he was possessed. He himself said, after having extemporised Fantasias for some time, to a favoured member of the orchestra at Leipzig, "Now you have heard Mozart for the first time;" and it was not until his wife had repeatedly heard him extemporise fugued Fantasias, and complained that he had neglected that serious style of composition, that he composed in set form, and published the work (the Fantasia and Fugue in C) which is probably in many respects typical of the style of his extempore performances when in a happy humour. The distinction between this and the majority of the published solo works is remarkable. The pianoforte is treated in a much fuller style than usual, the modulations and the forms of the figure passages are far more bold and original than in the majority of the Sonatas, and the whole of the Fantasia portion must in its day have been considered exceptionally difficult; and this last point is one to be borne in mind in considering the style of the published works generally. At a time when refinements of execution were so little advanced that people (musicians apparently) were astonished at Mozart's power of keeping his two hands independent in the tempo rubato of an Adagio, it is obvious that there could not have been any market for works transgressing much beyond the boundaries of the current style and execution of the day. This Fantasia—the representation, as we conclude, of Mozart's extemporising style—stands nearly alone among his solo pianoforte works, and is one that can never really grow old, though it may be neglected for a time. If a first-class player were to deliver it at such a gathering as one of the Musical Union Concerts, the effect cannot be doubted for a moment. In this respect the composition stands higher even than the once well-known Fantasia in C minor (it is to be feared that epithet can hardly now be applied to it), which foretells in a remarkable degree the pathos that Beethoven was to draw from the pianoforte, but still only does what was afterwards done by him with greater power and intensity; while the Fantasia and Fugue in C represents a power quite different from that of Beethoven, but quite as complete and as elevated in its own way.

It is impossible to believe that the mood which could produce such music as this for the pianoforte was as exceptional with Mozart as the published pianoforte works might lead one hastily to imagine. The grace which pervades everything he wrote is as conspicuous in these works as elsewhere, but it is also in many instances a superficial grace, compared with what marks the acknowledged best efforts of his genius. We do not very often find that concentrated power and significance of treatment which constantly characterise the smallest gavotte or bourrée of Bach, and is the secret of the influence which these short but not slight compositions have over us. But every one knows that Mozart could show, and has shown frequently, this concentrated power of construction in a short space as remarkably as Bach ever did; as in the minuet of the "Jupiter Symphony" and in that little stray Minuet in D, for pianoforte solo, which is such a complete specimen of elevated style on a small scale. We are therefore led to the conclusion that the lofty style and concentrated power which every now and then are illustrated to perfection in Mozart's pianoforte compositions represent the real Mozart as he was when extemporising on the pianoforte for his own pleasure, or that of a few favoured and specially sympathetic listeners; that the bulk of his published piano music was of less importance to him than a good many other things which he did; and that it represents Mozart taking life easily, and supplying the clavier-playing public with "food convenient for them."

Music written within these limits, even by a composer of genius, of course inevitably has its day. The time comes when the devices once thought so charming have become worn out, when the passages once thought so full of feeling have come to seem comparatively tame and cold to a generation which has new sympathies and fashions. Music which gives very wide-spread and general pleasure in its own day does so very often exactly because it has nothing very permanent in it, and appeals to those general likings of society which do not penetrate beneath the surface of art. Thus a great deal of Mozart's pianoforte music is admirably written for the style and execution prevalent in his day, just as Handel's operas were admirably written for the singers and for the public of his own day. When the style of playing and of vocalisation changes with the demands made upon the art by a new generation, the kind of charm which such works once had, the charm arising from finish of form and perfect fitness for the means of execution, fades away, and it is then seen that there is very little behind the form. But it should by no means be inferred that Mozart's piano-music, even taken as a whole, has no more right to the sympathies of the present age than have Handel's operas. Many even of the works which seem now to belong entirely to the past in style and feeling are so graceful and symmetrical, and so completely adapted to the genius of the keyboard as it appeared to the players of that day, that it is worth while sometimes to go back a little in spirit, and endeavour to enjoy them from the composer's point of view. When we look at the early concertos in this light, we are struck by the complete appreciation which Mozart at once evinced of the effective methods of contrast between the piano and orchestra; the bright glitter of scale passages for the solo instrument, accompanied by more sustained passages for the band, and, conversely, the due relief of the more sustained piano passages by broken lights and shadows in the accompaniment. These things are commonplaces and matters-of-course now, but they were in a great measure new effects at the time. Every now and then, too, in the midst of what now seems faded and weak in effect, we are surprised by a passage breathing a fuller tone and feeling, as if the new genius of the pianoforte were hinting at his future forms of expression. In the Concerto in B flat, for instance (No. 2 in Breitkopf and Härtel's new edition), we come in the slow movement upon passages which are quite in advance of the harpsichord style in which the other two movements are written—where the minor second, emphasised by octaves in both hands, is something quite in the modern style, and would probably have scandalised many respectable persons in those days. The whole movement, simple enough as it is, is in a high strain of feeling throughout, and compares curiously with the somewhat conventional prettinesses of the rest of the work.

In the same kind of way, in the solo sonatas, we are frequently surprised by details of startling individuality in the midst of works which in the main seem composed in an antiquated conventional manner. The Sonata in C (No. 60 of Potter's edition), evidently an early work, surprises us with a passage—which looks as if it had been the suggestion of a well-known feature in the first movement of Beethoven's Op. 22 Sonata. In the Rondo of the Sonata in F, a cradle-song tune to begin with, the composer suddenly assumes his serious contrapuntal face at the opening of the Coda; in that of the Sonata in B flat, still more childlike in the naïveté of its leading theme and general style, we are suddenly delighted and refreshed by the charming way of ornamenting the dominant pedal passage leading to the return of the subject—

a passage which takes us far away from the old "turn" and "trill" school. The slow movements, even of the more conventional sonatas, are in the majority of instances beautiful; and the deeper feeling generally infused into them is an evidence of the truth of the view which holds that Mozart's genius, in spite of the repute of cheerfulness which attaches to it, was essentially of a melancholy turn.

The Sonata in B flat commencing in unison, the first and last movements of which might have been Haydn's, has a slow movement replete with the deepest feeling, and which no change of fashion can ever permanently injure. It has few notes, compared with modern pianoforte music, but they are notes not one of which can be spared; and is full of passionate and constantly changing feeling from the first bar to the last.

Unfortunately, people cannot think that anything is passionate or intense in pianoforte music now unless it is in handfuls of notes, with a constant use of the pedal to sustain combinations which cannot be manipulated otherwise. In this respect, it may perhaps be said that the study of Mozart's pianoforte music is a useful lesson in regard to scale, a practical proof that powerful expression does not depend on the absolute number of notes employed or on the sonority of the effects produced. The practice of playing solo pianoforte music so much in large rooms has probably operated to vitiate public taste to some extent in regard to the capabilities of the piano. The solo sonatas of Beethoven are constantly over-played, if one may use the expression, to make them tell in a large concert-room, whereas they were intended to be to the drawing-room what the orchestra is to the concert-room. And if we turn to one or two of the solo sonatas of Mozart, which really represent the genius of the composer at his best, we are still more impressed with the fact that many notes and much noise are not necessary conditions of grand music. Except the fantasia and fugue above mentioned, no work stands out as so emphatically great among Mozart's solo pianoforte compositions as the first movement of the A minor Sonata. It is as broad and abstract in style as the first movement of the Waldstein Sonata; it may be questioned indeed if it is not in a really more elevated style. But the mechanical means of producing the effect are of the simplest, and the essential greatness of the music is in danger of being underrated by modern amateurs, from the acquired habit of associating greatness of style on the instrument with handfuls of notes and the constant use of the pedal. Many modern players, if they played the work at all, would probably much prefer to substitute for the actual notation of the theme—

which is the kind of way it would have been written if the theme had occurred to a composer of the present day as a motive for a grand sonata; and so on in proportion through the sonata.* And to satisfy what is now expected from pianoforte-playing in a large concert-hall, such a treatment would almost seem necessary. Yet no essential greatness could be added to the music by such means, and it would lead to a much coarser and less pure style of expression and finish of the music, in regard to the most essential characteristics of pianoforte music. But this taste for loud and heavy playing seems to have been fostered recently by too frequent a habit of playing in large concert-rooms music originally intended for the drawing-room. The playing and the style have to be forced to make the music tell in a large space; while when played under the conditions for which it was composed the scale of the movement is all in perfect keeping, and no more notes are required to give it its full grandeur of expression.† The transcription of this fine movement for the organ is an experiment, however, that might be very well worth trying.

The last movement of this sonata has been sometimes quoted as of special interest owing to the forecast of Beethoven's style which it gives; but though this gives a great interest to it and to the C minor Sonata, Mozart is never really so fine as when he is in his own style in its most matured form, and not straying beyond it; which indeed may perhaps be said of every composer. In his "advanced" music we feel that something has been aimed at which is not quite achieved. A more successful move in advance of his day is shown in the slow movement of the same sonata (the A minor), in a fine and, for that date (even for Mozart), unusual attempt to give an orchestral breadth of expression to the music while keeping strictly to the pianoforte style, in the fine episode commencing—

And if there were any longer room for question about the authorship of any part of the Requiem, it would be of interest to compare the half-close of this episode, before the resumption of the principal subject, with the passage in the "Recordare" at the words "Ne perenni cremer igne." Some of the anticipations of Mozart as to special forms of expression in pianoforte composition are worth notice. Beethoven's commencement of the Concerto in G by a few bars for the piano alone, then leaving it long silent, was very near being anticipated in Mozart's Concerto in E flat (No. 9 of Breitkopf and Härtel), where the orchestra calls attention in a unison

* Dr. Von Bülow, it appears, has actually modified some classical works of great composers in this kind of manner.

† We used to try playing the running passages in the bass, at the close of each section of this movement, in octaves, by way of giving more dignity to the close, but soon came to the conclusion that where Mozart did not write octaves they were no improvement.

phrase, and the piano then gives out, alone, the leading phrase of the subject:—

This is repeated, and then the piano is silent during the usual peroration of the orchestra, entering at last unexpectedly with a long shake on a high note, again in a rather Beethovenish manner. Some striking suggestions, for the time at which they were made, are to be found in the little-known set of variations on Grétry's lovely old tune, "Une fièvre brulante" (which, it may be remembered, Beethoven also treated in the variation form). The composition was evidently regarded as rather a special "piece"; it contains one variation marked "bravura," containing what were probably considered showy difficulties in that day, including a good many rapid scale passages in thirds, which remind one of Mozart's description of Clementi's playing, "He has a brilliant right hand, and his principal passages are thirds," and suggest the idea that this was meant as something in Clementi's line. But the interesting variation is the fourth, which is in the form of a highly impassioned recitative with interlude phrases, in a remarkably modern style: ex. gr.—

The conclusion of the whole composition is also worth noting, the leading phrase of the theme repeated in diminuendo—

The final close being left as an inversion of the chord, to keep the idea intact.

But this must be our last quotation from works from which it is strange to think that any of the quotations should be new, as we have no doubt they are, to not a few of our pianoforte-playing readers, among the amateurs at all events. These last would do well to study some of these half-forgotten, or at least ignored, pianoforte compositions of Mozart, if only to keep the balance against the too exclusive cultivation of Schumann and Grieg which is carried on at present in our drawing-rooms.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE CLAVICHORD, WITH HISTORICAL NOTICES.

By Carl Engel.

That Johann Sebastian Bach was an admirer of the clavichord is evident not only from the fact of his having written for it some of his finest compositions, but also from certain recorded observations. He appreciated it more highly than the harpsichord, on account of its capability of yielding to the intentions of the performer, and of permitting various modifications of expression to be obtained merely by the touch. He always preferred to play on the clavichord; the harpsichord was for him too soulless, and the pianoforte too coarse. This statement is to be found in the biographical sketch of J. S. Bach written by J. N. Forkel, who was personally acquainted with the two eldest sons of the great composer, Friedemann and Emanuel.

When, in the year 1726, Gottfried Silbermann submitted to J. S. Bach for examination a pianoforte which Silbermann had made, Bach declared that his clavichord was decidedly superior to it in regard to expression and delicacy of touch. No doubt he was right; and his candid criticism, which is said to have offended Silbermann, may perhaps evidence the imperfection of the pianoforte at that time rather than the excellence of the clavichord. It must be remembered that the pianoforte was then a new invention still in its infancy, dating from about the year 1711, when it suggested itself to Cristofori to substitute hammers for the jacks and crowquills in the clavicembalo. Moreover, it is recorded that in 1741, about twenty years after his first attempt, Silbermann succeeded in constructing two pianofortes which obtained the approval of J. S. Bach.

G. Silbermann's pianofortes had the shape of the harpsichord. In the year 1758 C. E. Friderici, at Gera, in Central Germany, commenced constructing pianofortes in the oblong-square shape of the clavichord. In order to distinguish his instrument from that of Silbermann, he called it Fortbien. However, there is no satisfactory evidence for the statement, found in almost all the treatises on the history of the pianoforte, that Friderici (or Friederici, as modern writers spell his name) was the first pianoforte-maker who adopted the oblong-square shape. On the contrary, there are indications of this shape having been adopted at an early period, and of its having been suggested by the clavichord. The organ-builder Spath, in Ratisbon, is recorded to have altered clavichords into pianofortes by substituting hammers for the tangents. As there lived in Ratisbon (German, "Regensburg") two organ-builders of this name—viz., Franz Jakob Spath, who died at an advanced age in the year 1760, and Johann Adam Spath, who may have been his son—and as their christian names are not given in the records, it is impossible to determine precisely the time when those pianofortes were made. In Rimbault's book on the pianoforte may be seen an illustration of an early square pianoforte, but no date is given. There must have been such instruments in Germany about the year 1750, if not earlier. On the other hand, D. G. Türk, in his instruction-book for playing the clavichord, published in the year 1789, defines the pianoforte (or fortepiano, as he calls it) as having the shape of a small harpsichord; and, he adds, "some new and diminutive kinds have the shape of the clavichord."

It is not my intention here to allude to the early history of the pianoforte further than is necessary for showing how certain peculiarities in its construction were anticipated in the clavichord. Gottfried Silbermann's pianoforte had two strings in unison for each tone throughout, just like the clavichord. The higher octaves were rather weak in comparison with the bass, and it was this inequality of sound upon which J. S. Bach especially remarked when he examined Silbermann's first instruments. In fact, it was so generally objected to by the clavichord-players, that the manufacturers of the "new instrument" were soon induced to attempt to remedy the defect by the employment of three or more strings for each tone in the treble. Jakob Adlung, in his work entitled "Anleitung zur musikalischen Gelahrtheit," the first edition of which appeared at Erfurt in the year 1758, mentions such improved pianofortes, which he saw in Erfurt, and which were made by Fickert, in Zeitz, Prussia. The highest octave had five strings for each tone, the middle octaves four, and the lowest octave three. This arrangement was adopted, Adlung remarks, "not only with the object of ensuring the desirable equality in the power of sound, but also in order to prevent the frequent breaking of the string by offering a greater resistance to the force of the hammers." This expedient must date at least from the year 1750; at any rate, Wahlfried Fickert—or Ficker, as he is called in some German musical dictionaries—is recorded to have flourished as a manufacturer of organs and clavichords residing in Zeitz about the year 1730. Adlung states that the hammers were made either of wood or of horn, and the hammer-shanks either of wood or of metal. The instrument was called Hammerwerk, and also Hammerpantalon. The first designation was given to it when it was constructed so that the hammers struck the strings from below; and the second designation, when they struck the strings from above. This statement also shows that Beethoven, when he adopted on the title-page of some of his latest pianoforte sonatas the designation of Hammerklavier for pianoforte, did not exactly coin a new word. As regards the Hammerpantalon, there can be no doubt that it was suggested by the famous dulcimer constructed and played in public concerts by Pantaleon Hebenstreit, which in the beginning of the eighteenth century became known by the name of Pantaleon, and was afterwards called Pantalon. In this dulcimer the strings were of course vibrated by being struck from above.

It is curious to observe how long a time the pianoforte had to struggle with its precursors, the clavichord and harpsichord, before it obtained the regard of musical composers. It is difficult to believe that the "new instrument" should not have been known to Handel as well as it was to J. S. Bach, considering that J. Mattheson, in Hamburg, the friend of Handel's youth, knew it well, and noticed it as early as in the year 1725, in the second volume of his "Critica Musica." Still more strange it appears that neither the musical dictionary by J. Walther (Leipzig, 1732), nor even a later one, the second edition of "Musikalisches Lexicon" (Chemnitz, 1749), notice the pianoforte. J. Walther mentions, however, Cristofori, whom he calls Cristofali, as having invented "a clavessin on which piano and forte can be produced," and he refers the reader to Mattheson's "Critica Musica."

After J. S. Bach's commendation of Silbermann's achievements in 1741, the pianoforte began to attract the attention of some other German musicians of reputation. For instance, Johann Joachim Quantz, the distinguished flute-player of King Frederick II. of Prussia, remarks in his comprehensive instruction-book for the flute, published at Berlin in the year 1752: "The modification of loudness cannot be obtained so well on the harpsichord, if it has only a single keyboard, as it can be obtained on the instrument which is called pianoforte, and which contains hammers instead of quills. . . . Indeed, the pianoforte possesses all the conditions which are requisite for a good accompaniment, and it depends only upon the performer to employ them judiciously. True, a good clavichord possesses also these conditions; but it cannot produce the same effect, because a fortissimo is not obtainable."

In England it took a still longer time than in Germany before the pianoforte gained popular favour. The playbill of the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden, dating from the year 1767, which announces the pianoforte as "a new instrument"—half a century after its invention—has been so often mentioned that it is unnecessary to say more about it than that this suggestive document may be seen framed at Messrs. Broadwood's. At all events, records like these ought to be taken into consideration in appreciating our social music of the time of Handel.

It is to be regretted that the biographers of Johann Sebastian Bach do not positively state which of his compositions for keyed stringed instruments were originally intended by him for the clavichord and which for the harpsichord. However, in most instances this is ascertainable from the title or from the characteristics of the composition. For example, it admits of no doubt that the series of Preludes and Fugues issued by him under the title "Das wohltemperirte Clavier" were conceived for the clavichord; and the same may be surmised of the famous Chromatic Fantasia, on account of the various modifications in accent and expression which it constantly demands from the touch of the player. On the other hand, the "Thirty Variations on an Air," in which the effects are to a great extent calculated upon the employment of two manuals, and upon the different qualities of sound produced by registers or stops, were originally conceived for the harpsichord (clavicembalo); and this is also the case with his concertos, which, being intended for public performance, require a more powerful sound than that of the clavichord. Furthermore, it appears probable that with many compositions of this kind J. S. Bach wished to leave it optional whether they should be played on the clavichord or on the harpsichord. It must be borne in mind that in his time the art of instrumentation had not advanced to the degree of development which it has attained in the present century. Handel states on the title-page of his Concertos that they are intended for the harpsichord or organ—two instruments which have nothing in common as far as treatment and quality of sound are concerned. Nevertheless, it is desirable to ascertain which of Bach's compositions were especially intended for the clavichord, since it is instructive to the musical student to know the works of the great masters of his art exactly as they were originally conceived.

The assertion of some of our musical writers that J. S. Bach's clavichord had a compass of only four octaves is evidently unfounded. Probably it arose from an examination of his clavichord compositions, which are generally restricted to that compass. But we know that he possessed a fine clavichord made by G. Silbermann; and we shall presently see that about the year 1750, and most likely at an earlier period, G. Silbermann constructed his clavichords with a greater compass than four octaves. As Emanuel Bach, in 1753, regarded the greater compass requisite for a good clavichord, it is not likely that his eminent father, who died in 1750, should not have possessed an instrument with such a compass, especially as he was a friend of G. Silbermann. The real reason why the clavichord compositions written during the first half of the eighteenth century seldom overstep four octaves may be found in the circumstance that the extension of the compass beyond these limits was at that time still rather an extraordinary adoption, the older and common clavichords having generally only four octaves. Besides, the tones above this compass were in most instances too thin and feeble to be of much use; and a further extension of the bass produced indistinct and humming sounds, so that it was found advisable to add a thin octave string to each tone in order to render the bass more distinct. This contrivance was apt to render the lowest tones too prominent; no wonder that the composers rather kept to the four octaves which had the most effective quality of sound, and which offered no impediment to their compositions being played on any clavichord, no matter whether it was an old one or a new one.

J. S. Bach's Chromatic Fantasia extends in the treble to—and in the bass not lower than—

This beautiful composition is therefore confined to the compass of four octaves. On the harpsichord the extension of the compass was effected at a somewhat earlier period than on the clavichord, probably because the twang of the quills renders the low bass tones and high treble tones much more distinct than does the push of the tangents.

Having given the opinions of Handel and J. S. Bach on the capabilities of the clavichord, it is hardly necessary to give those of their contemporary fellow-artists, since the opinions of these two masters have ten times more weight than all the others taken together. I must, however, make an exception in favour of Emanuel Bach, because he was probably the most accomplished clavichord player who has ever lived.

Dr. Burney, who visited Emanuel Bach in Hamburg in the year 1772, relates in his journal: "He was so obliging as to sit down to his Silbermann clavichord and favourite instrument, upon which he played three or four of his choicest and most difficult compositions, with the delicacy, precision, and spirit for which he is so justly celebrated among his countrymen. In the pathetic and slow movements, whenever he had a long note to express he absolutely contrived to produce from his instrument a cry of sorrow and complaint as can only be effected upon the clavichord, and perhaps by himself."

Likewise J. F. Reichardt, the well-known Prussian Kapellmeister, who visited E. Bach in Hamburg in the year 1774, records ("Briefe eines aufmerksamen Reisenden." Frankfurt, 1774; vol. ii., p. 16): "Herr E. Bach, plays not only a very slow and song-like Adagio with the most touching expression, to the shame of many players on other instruments who, considering the natural capabilities of their instruments, might imitate the human voice with even less difficulty; he is also able to sustain in this slow tempo a tone of the duration of six quavers with all degrees of power and softness; and this he can do in the bass as well as in the treble. But he can accomplish it probably only on his precious Silbermann clavichord, for which he has also especially written some Sonatas in which he has introduced such long-sustained tones. The same remark applies to the extraordinary power with which he renders some passages. Indeed, it is the strongest fortissimo; any other clavichord but Silbermann's would be knocked to pieces by it. And then, again, we have the most delicate pianissimo, which it would be impossible to produce at all on any other clavichord."

According to E. L. Gerber ("Historisch-biographisches Lexicon der Tonkünstler." Leipzig, 1790), the Silbermann clavichord which Emanuel Bach possessed, and which he highly appreciated, was constantly used by this eminent musician during the last fifty years of his life. As he died in 1788 he must have become possessed of it about the year 1738. No doubt the old clavichord was more durable than is the pianoforte, not only on account of the simplicity of its mechanism, but also because it was treated much more gently than the pianoforte is treated by most pianists of the present day. It would, however, appear that E. L. Gerber's statement requires rectification. According to C. H. Bitter ("Carl Philipp Emanuel und Wilhelm Friedemann Bach." Berlin, 1868; vol. ii., p. 118), the Silbermann clavichord was not among the effects of Emanuel Bach; and it is conjectured that he disposed of it in the year 1781, because there is among his compositions a Rondo in E minor, written in the year 1781, and headed, "Abschied von meinem Silbermann'schen Clavier" ("Farewell to my Silbermann Clavichord"). Be this as it may, we learn from a letter of his, dated "Hamburg, 1773," that he valued Friderici's clavichords especially on account of their great equality of tone, and that he objected to the additional octave-string in the bass adopted by Barthold Fritz. Among his effects were two clavichords by Friderici, a harpsichord, and a pianoforte by Jung.

In his celebrated work, "Versuch über die wahre Art das Clavier zu spielen" ("An Essay on the True Method of playing the Clavichord." Berlin, 1753), Emanuel Bach remarks: "The harpsichord is chiefly used for concertante music, and the clavichord for playing alone. The new forte-piano [the pianoforte], if it is manufactured well and durable, possesses many advantages; but its peculiar treatment is difficult, and requires especial study. The instrument suits well for solo performances, and also in concertante music, if there are not too many instruments combined with it. I am, however, of opinion that a fine clavichord, although its tone is less loud, possesses all the beauties of the forte-piano, and has in addition the Bebung [a sort of tremolo] and the sustained sound, because I can give the key an additional pressure after having struck it. The clavichord is, therefore, the instrument on which we can judge most accurately the accomplishments of a player on stringed instruments with a keyboard. For the qualities of a fine clavichord it is requisite that it should have, besides a sonorous and insinuating sound, the proper number of keys, which should at least extend from—

The high E is desirable because it enables the clavichord-player to try occasionally also compositions which are not written for his instrument. Besides, our composers are rather fond of extending the compass so high, since there are other instruments on which this tone can be produced without very great difficulty. The keys must have the proper weight for raising the finger. The strings must be so strong as to permit their being forcibly attacked as well as to be treated tenderly, so that the player is enabled to produce with distinctness and purity all kinds of passages, be they loud or soft. . . . Whoever can play the clavichord well can also play the harpsichord well, but not vice versâ. The clavichord ought, therefore, to be practised for attaining the right expression in performance, and the harpsichord for strengthening the fingers."

As regards the Bebung before alluded to, Emanuel Bach says: "A long-sustained tone which requires a passionate expression is appropriately given with the Bebung. This is produced by holding the key down with the finger, and then, so to say, balancing the finger on the key." The signs for the Bebung he gives thus:—

It will be observed that this peculiar kind of tremolo cannot be produced on the harpsichord, because it requires the tangent while pressed against the string to act on it with a trembling motion, somewhat like the finger of the violin-player when he produces a similar effect on a sustained note. Probably the effective "cry of sorrow and complaint," recorded by Dr. Burney in the extract from his journal quoted before, was produced by the Bebung.

As this mode of expression is very peculiar, and as it cannot be exactly rendered even on our most perfect grand piano, it may interest the reader to have also the explanation of it given in the instruction-book for the clavichord by Daniel Gottlob Türk ("Klavierschule, oder Anweisung zum Klavierspielen." Leipzig and Halle, 1789), which is generally considered as one of the best works of its kind. Türk says: "The Bebung (French, balancement; Italian, tremolo) can be applied effectively only to a long-sustained tone, especially in compositions of a plaintive character. It is usually indicated in the notation by these marks—or by the word tremolo being written over the note; and its execution is thus—

In order to produce it effectually the finger must be held on the key as long as the duration of the tone demands, and the player must endeavour to increase the loudness of the tone by a gentle pressure of his finger several times repeated. It is perhaps hardly necessary to say that after each pressure the weight must be slightly relaxed, without however raising the finger entirely from the key. Moreover, every one knows that this expression is only attainable on a clavichord, and indeed only on a very good one. In general, the player ought to guard himself against the frequent employment of the Bebung, and if he employs it he must take care to avoid the objectionable manner of forcing the tone above its pitch by too vehement a pressure."

In order to show how Emanuel Bach used the Bebung in his clavichord compositions, an example is given, taken from the Andante of the second Sonata of his "Sechs Clavier-Sonaten für Kenner und Liebhaber" ("Six Clavichord Sonatas for Connoisseurs and Amateurs." Leipzig, 1779):—

The Sonata from which this example has been copied is the same which Professor C. F. Cramer, a friend of E. Bach, distinctly points out ("Magazin der Musik." Hamburg, 1783; p. 1217) as one of the compositions expressly written by E. Bach for his Silbermann clavichord, "on which instrument he used to play it with particular delight." Now as this Sonata extends in the treble to—it is evident that the Silbermann clavichord in the possession of E. Bach must have had a compass embracing that tone. D. J. Türk, in enumerating the qualities of a good clavichord, remarks: "Its compass should be at least thus—but, at the present day, preference is given to an extension in the bass to—

Nay, some manufacturers adopt even a still wider compass." It must be borne in mind that Türk's book dates from the year 1789. His statement affords a glance at the attempts at improvement which were in the second half of the eighteenth century resorted to in the construction of the clavichord. He speaks of registers or stops—such as the Cœlestina, the Pantalon, &c.—with which some of these instruments were provided; but he disapproves of them because "they bring the strings out of tune, and spoil the touch of the player."

If large dimensions, a keyboard comprising five octaves, and the greatest power obtainable, constituted the chief requisites of a fine clavichord, no doubt preference must be given to the specimens which were made during the second half of the eighteenth century. Still, it would appear that the clavichords of Silbermann and of his pupil Friderici, dating from the first half of the eighteenth century, have seldom been rivalled and never been surpassed, as far as nicety of mechanism, accuracy of touch, and delicacy of expression are concerned. As regards the harpsichord, its highest degree of perfection in tone and touch was evidently attained at an earlier period. At all events, it may be doubted whether the famous Rucker's harpsichords, dating from the seventeenth century, have in this respect ever been eclipsed by the grand and full-toned harpsichords which were made towards the end of the eighteenth century, especially in England, and which, it must be admitted, are remarkably fine.

In short, it would appear that the best clavichords and harpsichords were in existence at the time of Bach and Handel; and we know from the biographical notices transmitted to us that these eminent musicians had, as might indeed be expected, instruments by the most distinguished makers.

But it is unnecessary to discuss this question further here; I merely draw attention to it because an acquaintance with the history of these instruments seems to me important for obtaining a correct appreciation of our classical music composed for the precursors of the pianoforte. With this music every musician, and especially every professional pianist, ought to be familiar; and it is chiefly the desire to assist, in however small a degree, in promoting the study of classical instrumental music which has induced me to give a detailed description of the clavichords in my possession.

Messrs. Broadwood have kindly consented to my proposal to place the Gebundene Klavier (Clavichord No. 4) in one of their rooms in Great Pulteney Street, where it may be seen during the present month (September). I therefore invite my musical friends—and my musical enemies also, if I have any—to go and examine it; or, still better, to play on it Bach's fugues precisely as he himself played them on the clavichord.

AN ANALYSIS OF BEETHOVEN'S "MISSA SOLEMNIS."

By Fr. Niecks.

In the April number of The Musical Times I endeavoured to characterise Beethoven and his "Missa Solemnis"; now I wish to supplement those general remarks by an analysis of this work. The mention of a few dates and circumstances relative to the history of its birth and existence may not be deemed an inappropriate prelude to an exposition of the internal structure and pervading spirit. Beethoven began the composition of his Opus 123 in the winter of 1818-1819, and on February 27, 1822, announced its completion in a letter to his pupil, the Archduke Rudolph, into whose hands a copy of the score was delivered on March 19, 1822. Schindler relates that the composer put the finishing touch to the "Missa" in the summer of that year, when he was staying at Baden, near Vienna. At any rate the work attained completion two years too late for its original destination, namely, to be performed at the installation of the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmütz, an event which took place on March 20, 1820. Almost the only pleasant fact on record of Beethoven's life at that time is the satisfactory state of his health. "Forgive the confusion," he writes from Vienna, on April 16, 1819, to Ferdinand Ries, in London, "if you knew my situation you would not be astonished at it. Rather at what I here accomplish in spite of it." And again on May 25: "Do not forget the quintett, Op. 104, and the Sonata, and the money; I meant to say, The honorarium, avec ou sans honneur." Schindler informs us that the pension which Beethoven received from the Archduke Rudolph and the Princes Kinski and Lobkowitz had shrunk to £90 a year; and that besides this sum he had only the proceeds of the sale of four sonatas—Op. 106, completed in 1819, and Op. 109, 110, and 111, composed in the winter of 1821-1822—the only important works, if we add to them the Overture in C, Op. 124, which he wrote during the time he was busy with the Mass. The particulars of this account may not be quite correct—the pension, for instance, was in reality £136—but the fact that the master's income during the years 1818-1822 was inadequate to supply his wants can, unfortunately, not be doubted. Thayer calculates that in the spring of 1823 Beethoven's debts amounted to 7,000 florins. In the year 1820 such was the composer's lack of money that he had to content himself for four days with a glass of beer and some rolls for dinner. Of course he might have sold the shares he had bought in the prosperous time of the Congress; but these were to be a legacy for that scapegrace, his nephew, and must not be touched. An idea of his domestic felicity may be formed by throwing a glance at his diary of the year 1819: "January 31.—Given notice to the housekeeper. February 15.—The cook has come. March 8.—Given 14 days' notice to the cook. March 22.—The new housekeeper has come. May 12.—Arrived at Mödlin [village near Vienna]. Miser et pauper sum." And so on in the same key. But the master was tried by more grievous troubles than pecuniary difficulties, mean privations, and the teasing annoyances of housekeeping. A lawsuit between him and his sister-in-law, begun in 1816 and not ended till 1820, was especially a cause of great vexation and bitterness to him. His nephew had been recommended to his care by his dying brother, but the mother of the boy, whom Beethoven held to be a woman of doubtful moral character, disputed the guardianship with him. The earnestness and conscientiousness with which the composer undertook the charge of his nephew's education are characteristic of the man. This new duty engrossed his thoughts and influenced his actions, it incited him to live and work. All these circumstances contemporaneous with the composition of the Mass must be taken into account, and also his previous career with its sad sufferings—the hardship of his childhood, his bodily diseases, above all the loss of hearing, with the consequent social isolation, &c.—for they show us how his soul was strung and tuned, and what agents were at work to produce music such as is heard in the "Missa Solemnis." Let us take note of two extracts from the diary which Beethoven kept at this time: "Hard is thy situation at present; but He above is, oh, He is, and without him nothing is."—"God, God, my Refuge, my Rock, Thou seest my heart! Oh hear, ever ineffable One, hear me, Thy unhappy, most unhappy of all mortals."

In a letter addressed to, but never received by Cherubini, dated March 15, 1823, Beethoven writes:—

"I recently completed a grand solemn Mass, and have resolved to offer it to the various European Courts, as it is not my intention to publish it at present. I have, therefore, asked the King of France, through the French Embassy here, to subscribe to this work, and I feel certain that his majesty would, at your recommendation, agree to do so.

"My critical situation demands that I should not solely fix my eyes upon Heaven, as is my wont; on the contrary, it would have me fix them also upon earth, here below, for the necessities of life."

The Courts which subscribed for a MS. copy of the score, at the price of fifty ducats—Austria was not honoured with an offer—were France, Russia, Prussia, Saxony, and Darmstadt. Two more copies were taken by Prince Anton Radziwill and J. N. Schelble, for the Cäcilien Verein at Frankfort. From Lenz's "Kritischer Katalog" it would appear that also Prince Nicholas Borissowitsch Galitzin was in possession of a copy, for which he had paid fifty ducats. King Louis XVIII. of France, on receiving the score, presented the composer with a heavy gold medal, bearing on one side the bust of his majesty and on the other the inscription, "Donné par le Roi à Monsieur Beethoven." The master was especially pleased with this mark of appreciation, because he thought he owed it to the recommendation of Cherubini, a composer whom he much admired. In 1825 Beethoven sold the Mass to the publisher Schott, of Mainz, for 1,000 florins. The title and dedication run thus: "Missa composita et serenissimo ac ementissimo Domino Rudolpho Joanni Caesareo Principi et Archiduci Austriae S. R. E. Tit. s. Petri in monte aureo, Cardinali et Archiepiscopo Olnicensi profundissima cum veneratione dedicata a Ludovico van Beethoven." The composer never heard a complete performance of his work; but at a concert which he was induced to give at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, Vienna, on May 7, 1824, there were performed under his direction, besides the Ninth Symphony, and the Overture, Op. 124, the Kyrie, Credo, Agnus Dei, and Dona from the "Missa Solemnis," which, in order to satisfy the censor, who objected to the word "Missa," appeared on the programme as "Three great Hymns with solos and chorus." It was at this concert that the singer, Mdlle. Ungher, had to turn the deaf composer round that he might see the applause of the audience which he could not hear. The honour of having for the first time performed the complete work does not belong to Germany, but to Russia, where it was given on March 26, 1824. A note prefaced to Peters's edition of the score informs us that in Cologne the first performance took place on May 27, 1844; in Leipzig, on March 21, 1845; in Bonn, on August 10, 1845. Turning over the leaves of an old Vienna periodical, I came across a notice which mentions a performance of the work, in 1831, at Wansdorf, near Runeburg, in Bohemia, by 109 singers and players, under the direction of the schoolmaster, J. V. Richter. During the last twenty years the work has been somewhat more frequently heard. Riedel's Society, at Leipzig, performed it twelve times in the course of twenty-five years. Germany distinguished herself especially in 1870, the Beethoven centenary: the Mass was performed in May, at Weimar (Tonkünstler-Versummlung); in September, at Bonn; in December, at Vienna (in the Saal der Musikfreunde); in the same month at Leipzig (Riedel's Society); and in other places. In England the "Missa Solemnis" was produced by the Philharmonic Society (under Costa) in 1846; by the Sacred Harmonic Society, twice (likewise under Costa), in 1861; and by Barnby's Choir, at St. James's Hall, in 1870. The rareness of the performances of this extraordinary work is attributable to various causes: to its length, which disqualifies it for church purposes; to its difficulties, which can be overcome only by the best executants, and after long, devout practice; to the composer's disregard of the natural limits and capabilities of the voice; and, lastly, to its sublime character and deep spiritual import, which were in advance of the age in which it was written, and for the great majority of concert-goers will always be inappreciable. But Beethoven was in no wise a practical man; his ideal was always dearer to him than vulgar success. Schindler, in writing of the time when the master began the composition of this Mass, says the Credo assumed, contrary to his plan, such dimensions that if he continued his path with his customary consistence it was impossible to foresee when the work would be completed. Indeed, hardly a third of the Mass was finished when the Archduke left for Olmütz. Beethoven does not allow himself to be determined by outward circumstances. This is a characteristic of the man and his art. He creates spontaneously, and his ideas suggest to him adequate forms and means. In 1823 Count Dietrichstein invited him to write a Mass for the Emperor. The Count, broaching this matter to Beethoven's friend, Count Lichnowski, said that the composer was at full liberty to follow the dictates of his genius, nevertheless he thinks he ought to mention that his majesty has such and such tastes (among other things he does not like fugues), that only certain instruments should be employed, and no solos for tenor and bass be introduced. [The resources of the imperial chapel were limited; the solo department, for instance, was represented by two boys, who sang the treble and alto solos.] Beethoven seemed to be pleased at this invitation, and agreed to write the desired Mass; but—let us note this—he never set to work to fulfil his promise. May we not presume with good reason that the restraints were too much for him? that he could or would not put Pegasus in the yoke? The master had such a hatred of everything that looked like restraint that even in times of distress he disregarded advantageous proposals from societies and publishers which were worthy of his genius and left a wide scope for his fancy.

What strikes the hearer or reader of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" first and chiefly, is its vastness. In number of bars it is surpassed by Cherubini's Solemn Mass in D minor, the longest mass existing, and also by Bach's "Hohe Messe," in B minor. Beethoven's work contains 1,929 bars; Bach's, 2,261; and Cherubini's, 2,563. [The first and the last figures are taken from Bellasis's book on Cherubini; the second is my own. I guarantee the correctness of none of them.] But what does the number of bars signify? They do not even imply a proportionate superiority in length. Indeed, in speaking of the vastness of the work, I thought less of the measureable material than of the ungaugeable spirit. Lenz, in his critical catalogue of the works of Beethoven, takes as the motto for the notice of the "Missa" a passage from Schlosser's "On the Tragedies of Æschylus"—"In their plan, as well as in their details, more than humanly sublime and almost awfully lofty"—which defines the character of the work strikingly. But size alone cannot produce this effect. Indeed, these gigantic forms are instinct with intensest life, expressive of superhuman strength—they reveal a wonderful insight and foresight of things human and divine. Of this, however, we shall be better able to judge after we have examined the various parts of the work, as then we shall be in a position to overlook the whole structure. And now we will proceed to the analysis.

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Op. 123, in D major, which is written for four solo voices, four-part chorus, full band (including four horns, three trombones, and double-bassoon), and organ (a ripieno part, nowhere of an individual, obbligato character), consists of five great divisions, each a complex of movements, namely, the Kyrie, the Gloria, the Credo, the Sanctus and Benedictus, and the Agnus Dei and Dona.

The Kyrie is laid out in three sections. The first of them, the setting of the words "Kyrie eleison," is an Assai sostenuto C, in D major (eighty-five bars).

To the marking of the movement the composer adds "mit Andacht" (with devotion). The reader will remember what the master wrote on the cover of the MS. of the Kyrie (in a former article, April number, p. 194, I wrote "Credo," which was a slip of the pen), "from the heart it comes, to the heart it shall penetrate." It is also worth noting that Beethoven conducted this part of the Mass in a stooping posture. All this proves that the man was really in earnest, and that composition meant with him something more than craftsmanship. The instrumental introduction contains the motivi out of which the first and third sections of the Kyrie are built up. The band (the trombones and double-bassoon excepted, which remain unemployed in this division) and organ open the movement with the solemn, majestic, rhythmical motivo—

A hush follows, which is made the more impressive by the interrupting soft chords (first the strings alone, then the strings, trumpets, and drums); at the fifth bar the strings take up a slow legato phrase, whereupon, at the next bar, the wood winds and horns join them with the motivo (No. 1, b), which soon gives place to the motivo (No. 1, c), accompanied by the strings with the motivo (No. 1, d). One more motivo (No. 1, e), I shall quote, a subordinate one like (d), but an important element—a devotional substratum—in the general complexion of this section. At the second half of the twenty-first bar the chorus, band, and organ intone the "Kyrie," rising at every new invocation with a grander and more massive accumulation of sounds above the steadfast tonic, whilst the solo voices, one after another, break in and check the bold utterances with their wailing appeals—the thought of man's littleness starting up in the midst of his contemplation of God's lordliness. The motivo (a) pictures to us, as it were, the omnipotence of the Ruler of the world; the motivo (b), man's frailty and helplessness. The word "eleison" is set to the supplicatory motivo (c), which is supported by the synonymous (d). I may mention further the metamorphosis of the motivo (c) shown at (f), and the employment of the voices in octaves and unisons with which the composer, here and elsewhere in this work, produces great effects.

The Assai sostenuto leads into an Andante assai ben marcato, $\frac{3}{2}$, in B minor (forty-two bars), which forms the second section of the Kyrie. The characteristic motivi of this section are two in number, the invocation "Christe" (a) and the supplication "Eleison" (b)—

Out of this simple and, to all appearance, poor material, Beethoven has constructed a very complex and superlatively beautiful movement. The voices move with the greatest independence, the two motivi being always interwoven; first, the orchestra introduces them, then the solo voices take them up, and a little later the chorus comes in. Thus there are eight individual vocal parts, and the orchestra is more than a reduplication of them. This maze of voices suggests a multitudinous congregation, and realises well the urgency and fervour of their prayer. But mark the difference in the conception of the Kyrie eleison and the Christe eleison; in the former the King and Judge is addressed, in the latter the Saviour and Intercessor. In the one case we stand afar off with fear and trembling, in the other we draw near trustfully. In the third section (Kyrie eleison) the material of the first receives a new elaboration, with the object of intensifying the first expression. A very fine passage begins in the eighteenth bar—the wood winds and horns breathe out sweetly and softly the syncopated motivo, or sustain notes, the strings accompany with chords (crotchets divided by rests), the trumpets and drums put in here and there a few subdued sounds, whilst first the trebles, then the tenors, and, lastly, the altos pronounce Kyrie, with the rhythmically diminished first motivo—

The modulation to E flat major, which occurs here, is truly lovely. And now the prayer becomes more and more urgent, as the modulations, the persistence in the syncopated phrase, the emphasising (No. 3, b) of the melodic outline of motivo (No. 1, c), the imitations that press on each other, &c., show.

The violence of the excitement gradually subsides, there are still heard some passionate appeals, but at last all thinking and feeling is absorbed by a calm devotional contemplation. The distinctive expression of the words "Kyrie" and "eleison," preserved throughout this section, must not be overlooked. Beethoven succeeded in his intention—this Kyrie penetrates to the heart. But the subtle spirit that wings its way from heart to heart cannot be described in words. The most exquisite beauties cannot be recorded, at least, not adequately. I may, however, say this. In whatever frame of mind the Kyrie finds us, before the last "eleison" has died away our hardness will be softened, our pride will be humbled. These feelings may be transient; still, they are precious seeds that may be productive of glorious fruits. One thinks with a shudder that this noble composition was on the point of being lost. When, after the removal to Döblin in the spring of 1821, Beethoven sorted his MSS., the Kyrie was missing. For several days the search for it was without result. Happily, however, it had not fared with the Kyrie as with Carlyle's first MS. of the "French Revolution," which a charwoman found in the office of the careless friend to whom it had been lent, and made use of for lighting the fire. And what had become of the Kyrie? The housekeeper had wrapped in it Beethoven's old boots; indeed nothing more suitable for the purpose than these fine large sheets—nothing, as far as appearance went, less worthy of preservation than these unsightly hieroglyphics. Let us not be too hard on the practical-minded woman.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

IN December, 1831, Mendelssohn, who had then reached his twenty-second year, was in Paris, busily observing and brightly commenting upon the artistic life of the gay capital. Taking advantage of the young man's presence at what he evidently looked upon as the chief factory of operatic drama, the elder Mendelssohn addressed to his son a serious letter enjoining him to seek the aid of some French librettist, and obtain a book which might afterwards be translated into German. Mendelssohn père was no doubt moved to this course by the brilliant success of Meyerbeer, and, it must be confessed, did not show his usual good sense under the circumstances. He, at any rate, ought to have known his essentially German son better. Meyerbeer was no German—at any rate while greater fortune could be secured by being anything else. "All things to all men" stood for his motto through life, and his works written for the French stage were such as Mendelssohn, with stronger principles and a higher conception of artistic aims, could never have imitated. We shall see in our master's interesting reply to his father's letter how repugnant was the course suggested. He begins by pointing out that a theme had already been decided upon, and that Immermann was then writing a libretto upon Shakespeare's "Tempest"—"a subject," he remarks, "which has been long in my thoughts." Immermann had the master's entire confidence. "I feel assured I may expect a first-rate libretto. . . . He knows what people like, and what to give them; but, above all, he is a genuine artist, which is the chief thing; but I am sure I need not say that I will not compose music for any words I do not consider really good, or which do not inspire me, and that any may do so it is essential that I should have your approval." After this dexterous homage to his father's judgment, Mendelssohn goes on to assert himself with a plainness that must have made the exacting old man in Berlin stare with surprise. "There is however one thing which consoles me, and it is that if I were to rely on my own judgment, I would again act precisely as I have now done, though I have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with a great deal of French poetry, and seeing it in the most favourable light. Pray pardon me for saying exactly what I think. To compose for the translation of a French libretto seems to me for various reasons impracticable, and I have an idea that you are in favour of it more on account of the success which it is likely to enjoy than for its own intrinsic merit." In this remark the old man saw his own face as in a mirror, and perhaps was a little troubled thereat. But his son had not concluded: "Moreover I well remember how much you disliked the subject of the 'Muette de Portici' ('Masaniello') a Muette too who had gone astray, and of 'Wilhelm Tell,' which the author seems almost purposely to have made tedious." Mendelssohn fully admitted that the road to success lay through Paris or London, by pleasing the taste of those cities: "Still it is not the only road; this is proved not only by all Weber's works, but also by those of Spohr, whose 'Faust' is here considered classical music, and which is to be given at the great Opera-house in London next season. . . . I am resolved, therefore, to make the attempt in Germany, and to live and work there as long as I can live there by my work, for this I consider my first duty. If I fail in this then I must leave it for London or Paris, where it is easier to get on. I see, indeed, where I should be better remunerated, and more honoured, and live more gaily and at my ease than in Germany, where a man must press forward and toil and take no rest—still, if I can succeed there I prefer the latter." While thus firmly taking his stand on a principle one must acknowledge to be noble, Mendelssohn wisely fortified his position by arguments of a practical nature: "None of the new libretti here would, in my opinion, be attended with any success whatever, if brought out for the first time on a German stage. One of the distinctive characteristics of them all is precisely of a nature that I should resolutely oppose, although the taste of the present day may demand it, and although I quite admit that it may be more prudent to go with the current than to struggle against it. I allude to that of immorality. In 'Robert le Diable' the nuns come one after the other to allure the hero of the piece, till at last the abbess succeeds in doing so. The same hero is conveyed by magic into the apartment of her whom he loves, and casts her from him in an attitude which the public here applauds, and probably all Germany will do the same; she then implores his mercy in a grand aria. In another opera, a young girl divests herself of her garments, and sings a song to the effect that next day at this time she will be married. All this produces effect, but I have no music for such things. I consider them ignoble, so if the present epoch exacts this style and considers it indispensable, then I will write oratorios." Again, we cannot but applaud the high principle of this young musician, who, at an age which covets fame, and with a temperament greedy of praise, refused to stoop for either, and would lose all rather than forfeit his own self-respect. Mendelssohn concludes the letter by pointing out that, even if he desired a French libretto, it would be impossible to get one: "No French poet would undertake to furnish me with a poem. Indeed, it is no easy matter to procure one from them for this stage, for all the best authors are overwhelmed with commissions. . . . It would never occur to any of them to write a libretto for a German theatre. In the first place it would be much more feasible to give the opera here, and much more rational too; in the second place they would decline writing for any other stage than the French, for they can scarcely imagine the existence of any other." Then follows a little bit of salve: "I know you will forgive me for having told you my opinion without reserve. You always allowed me to do so in conversation, so I hope you will not put a wrong construction on what I have written, and I beg you will amend my views by communicating your own." The letters contain no evidence that the father attempted to argue this matter out with the son, and indeed to suppose such a thing possible is to credit the elder Mendelssohn with little sense. Nothing can come from the work of a musician whose heart and soul are not in his theme; and for Mendelssohn to have attempted another "Robert le Diable" or "Masaniello," when influenced by the feelings above expressed, would have been to court utter defeat. The reader needs no telling that even Immermann's "Tempest" came to nothing; but it deserves mention that when our fastidious composer did begin an opera, he took his subject from the legends to which Richard Wagner was driven by pretty much the same route.

Mendelssohn plunged deeply into the exciting life of Paris, as it was in 1831, when the political pot was boiling furiously, and everybody was more or less a doctrinaire if not a St. Simonian. He speaks of this again and again in his usual bright style, and his words reveal too much of character to be passed over here. There was great talk at that time about the juste milieu in politics, and a powerful party tried hard to steer the vessel of State exactly midway between Scylla and Charybdis. About this our master has his little joke: "Yesterday I saw the milieu; it had on a light grey coat, looked very fashionable, and sat in the first place on the ministerial bench. It was sharply attacked by M. Mauguin, who has a very long nose." Presently, however, Mendelssohn caught the infection of political life around him, and there is evidence to show that if he did not actually coquet with the St. Simonians, they tried hard to make him a convert. Thus he writes to his father: "I have in my possession an appeal to mankind from P——, in which he makes his confession of faith, and invites every one to surrender a share of his property, however small, to the St. Simonians; calling on all artists to devote their genius in future to this religion, to compose better music than Rossini or Beethoven, to build temples of peace, and to paint like Raphael or David. I have twenty copies of this pamphlet, which P—— desired me, dear father, to send to you. I rest satisfied by sending you one, which you will find quite enough." Then the writer proceeds to show his father in how perfectly orthodox a light he regards this new heresy: "It is a bad sign of the state of the public mind here that such a monstrous doctrine should ever have arisen. . . . And then their ideas of universal philanthropy, of disbelief in hell, and the devil and eternal perdition, and of the annihilation of selfishness—ideas which, in our country, spring from nature, and are to be found all over Christendom, and without which I should not wish to live—they parade as a new invention and discovery, constantly repeating that they mean to transform the world, and to render mankind happy." Most of us will agree to take cum grano salis Mendelssohn's assertion that he would rather die than part with his belief in "the devil." He was addressing his father and wished before all to assure the old man that these new ideas were hated with a hatred wholesome in its completeness. Continuing his letter, Mendelssohn dismisses the subject with one of those strokes of sly humour which so enliven his correspondence: "I attended a meeting last Sunday where all the Fathers sat in a circle; then came the principal Father and demanded their reports, praising and blaming them, addressing the assembly, and issuing his commands: to me it was quite awful. He also has completely renounced his parents, and lives with the Fathers, his disciples, for whom he is endeavouring to negotiate a loan." Readers of French history very well know that the Government of the day saw mischief in the theories of St. Simon, and came down on their votaries with a heavy hand. To this Mendelssohn subsequently refers in his liveliest style: "Early this morning Hiller rushed in and told me he had just witnessed the arrest of the St. Simonians. He wished to hear their oration, but the Fathers did not come. All of a sudden soldiers made their way in and requested those present to disperse as quickly as possible. . . . A party of National Guards are placed in the street, and other soldiers marched there; everything is sealed up, and now the procès will begin. My B minor quartett, which is lying in the Rue Monsigny is also sealed up. The Adagio alone is in the style of the juste milieu, all the other parts mouvement. I suppose I shall eventually be obliged to play it before a jury."

From the portions of these Paris letters not devoted to music many additions to Mendelssohniana might be made. Here is one, for example: "The day previous I paid two musical visits to the grumbling Cherubini and the kind Herz. . . . Herz presently arrived and gave audience to his pupils. We were very loving, recalled old times, and besprinkled each other mutually with great praise. On his pianos is inscribed, 'Médaille d'or. Exposition de 1827.' This was very imposing. Thence I went to Erard's, where I tried over his instruments, and remarked written on them in large letters, 'Medaille d'or. Exposition de 1827.' My respect seemed to diminish. When I went home I opened my own instrument by Pleyel, and to be sure there also I saw in large letters, 'Medaille d'or. Exposition de 1827.' The matter is like the title of Hofrath, but it is characteristic. It is alleged that the Chambers are about to discuss the following proposition: 'All Frenchmen have, by their birth, a right to the order of the Legion of Honour, and permission to appear without the Order can only be obtained by special services to the State.'" On portraits our master is equally amusing: "A propos, shall I be lithographed full length? Answer what you will, I won't. One afternoon in Berlin, when I was standing before Schenck's shop, I registered a solemn vow, unheard by anybody, that I would never allow myself to be hung up till I became a great man. The temptation in Munich was strong, where they wished to drape me with a Carbonaro cloak, a stormy sky in the background, and my fac-simile underneath, but I happily got off by adhering to my principles. Here again I am rather tempted, for the likenesses are very striking, but I keep my vow; and if, after all, I never do become a great man, though posterity will be deprived of a portrait, it will have an absurdity the less." In this we find another proof of Mendelssohn's keen sense of the incongruous. A small man with a large portrait—the sensitive young composer shrank from such an anomaly. He would not lay himself open to the ridicule of a sarcastic world.

Turning to Mendelssohn's musical experiences as set forth in these letters, it is disheartening to find that politics had just then almost banished music from Paris. Nothing was, as we say, "going on," and with nothing to look at even our keen-eyed observer could see nothing. "The aspect of music here," he writes, "is miserable enough. The concerts in the Conservatoire, which were my great object, will probably not take place at all, because the Commission of the Ministry wished to give a commission to the Commission of the Society to deprive a Commission of Professors of their share of the profits; on which the Commission of the Conservatoire replied to the Commission of the Ministry that they might go and be hanged, and even then they would not agree to it. . . . The Opéra-Comique is bankrupt, and it has had vacation since I came. At the Great Opéra they only give little ones, which amuse me, though they neither provoke nor excite. Charon's Institut is closed; the Chapelle Royale is gone out like a light, not a single Mass is to be heard on Sundays in all Paris, unless accompanied by serpents." Under conditions like these Mendelssohn had to seek music in private, and found ample provocation to be busy. His chamber compositions were played by Baillot's quartett "with fire and spirit," and in return he extemporised so well that the audience "shouted and applauded like mad." Publishers soon began to worry him for pianoforte compositions à la Kalkbrenner and Herz, and, to crown all, Habeneck, when the Conservatoire concerts had been determined on, promised some of his orchestral works a place in the programme. But in the midst of all this the affectionate young man often thought of his distant home and became melancholy. His temperament was one of extremes, and, if no other evidence were forthcoming, there is plenty in the letters to show that but a step, in Mendelssohn's case, divided laughter from tears. We find him, in the midst of one bright and joyous epistle, suddenly remember that Christmas comes with the morrow, and then he says: "This is Christmas Eve, but I feel little interest in it, or in New Year's Night either. Please God, another year may wear a different aspect, and I will not then go to the theatre on Christmas Eve, as I am about to do to night, to hear Lablache and Rossini for the first time. How little I care about it! I should much prefer nut-crackers and apples to-day, and I think it very doubtful whether the orchestra will play anything as pretty as my Kinder Sinfonie. I must be content, however." Time and again we find Mendelssohn, despite the gaiety around him, "modulating," as he himself expressed it, "into the minor key." In February he heard that his friend Edward Rietz, a violinist, had gone to join the majority, upon which he wrote a letter that perhaps more than anything else reveals his profoundly emotional nature: "Many hopes, and a pleasant bright period of my life, have departed with him, and I never again can feel so happy. . . . I must now set about forming new plans, and building fresh castles in the air; the former ones are irrevocably gone, for he was interwoven with them all. . . . The former days are now indeed departed, but it is not those alone that I lose, but also the man I so sincerely loved. Had I never had any, or had I lost all cause for loving him, I must, without a cause, have loved him all the same. He loved me too, and the knowledge that there was such a man in the world—one on whom I could rely, who lived to love me, and whose wishes and aims were identical with my own—this is all over. It is the hardest blow that has yet befallen me, and never shall I forget it." Yet, curiously enough, when news arrived that Goethe had also gone, Mendelssohn gave to his old friend but a few commonplace lines: "The sad news of Goethe's loss makes me feel poor indeed. What a blow to the country? It is another of those tidings which I have received here, which will always recur to my mind at the very name of Paris, and not all the kindness I have received, nor the tumult and excitement, nor the life of gaiety, can ever efface this impression. May it please God to preserve us from still worse tidings and grant us all a happy meeting. This is the chief thing." "Still worse tidings" than the death of Germany's greatest poet is a phrase that demands explanation, and explanation may be found in the fact that when the letter was written, cholera—"the spectre," as Mendelssohn called it—raged in Paris, and men naturally thought more of themselves and those dear to them by ties of blood than of the greatest in whom they had no such instinctive interest. Let us not judge Mendelssohn harshly, therefore, for the comparative indifference with which Goethe's death was received. His thoughts ran upon the graver question whether himself and the family circle at Berlin would ever meet again unbroken. But the desponding or sorrowful moods illustrated by the quotations just given were exceptional. As a rule, Mendelssohn proved true to the gay side of his nature, and his remarks upon musical topics overflow with life and humour. Thus he gives the funniest possible sketch of the plot of "Robert le Diable," then playing at the Grand-Opéra, but relapses at the end into something of Schumann's gravity on the same subject: "I cannot imagine how any music could be composed on such a cold, formal extravaganza as this, and so the opera does not satisfy me. It is throughout frigid and heartless, and where this is the case it produces no effect on me. The people extol the music, but where warmth and truth are wanting I have no test to apply." He was in the mood, also, on one occasion to make some edifying remarks upon a composition by his sister Fanny. After noticing details as thus, for example: "What the deuce made you think of setting your G horns so high? Did you ever hear a G horn take the high G without a squeak?" and as thus: "Do not these deep oboes in the same passage growl away all pastoral feeling and all bloom?" he proceeds to remarks full of interest and importance, the force of which nobody need seek to heighten: "At the beginning of the aria alone are the words vigorous and spirited, and from them emanated the whole of your lovely piece of music. The music of the choruses is, of course, good, for it is written by you; but in the first place, it seems to me that it might be by any other good master; and, secondarily, as if it were not necessarily what it is, indeed as if it might have been differently composed. This arises from the poetry not demanding any particular music. I know that this is often the fault of my own compositions, but though I am fully aware of the beam in my own eyes, I would fain extract the mote from yours, to relieve you at once from its pressure. My résumé, therefore, is, that I would advise you to be more cautious in the choice of your words, because, after all, it is not everything in the Bible, even if it suits the theme, that is suggestive of music; but you have probably obviated these suggestions of mine in your new cantata, before being aware of them, in which case I might as well have said nothing." What underlies all this but the doctrine put forward by Richard Wagner with all the air of a discovery, that words chosen by the musician must be such as "yearn" for musical expression—that such words only may be allied to music, and that for them only one form of expression is appropriate. The difference is that Mendelssohn's ideas are clothed in simple, intelligible language, with no pretence at all, while those of Wagner are attended by a long array of mysterious verbiage which, though it fall grandly upon the ear, "darkens counsel" in the mind.

To this examination of the Paris letters need only be added the terms in which, writing from the French capital, Mendelssohn summed up the results of his travels, using as he did so a "more serious strain than common." His conclusion is just what those who have read so far might expect: "I must first, in taking a general view of the past, refer to what you defined as the chief objects of my journey, and wished me strictly to adhere to. I was closely to examine the various countries, and to fix on the one where I wished to live and to work; I was further to make known my name and capabilities, in order that the people among whom I resolved to settle should receive me well, and not be wholly ignorant of my career. . . . Always excepting those mistakes which are not discovered till too late, I think I have fulfilled these purposes. People now know that I exist and that I have a purpose, and any talent that I display they are ready to approve and to accept. . . . Your injunction, too, to make choice of the country that I preferred to live in I have equally performed, at least generally that country is Germany. This is a point on which I have now quite made up my mind. I cannot yet, however, decide on the particular city, for the most important of all, which for various reasons has so many attractions for me, I have not yet thought of in this light—I mean Berlin. This is also why I do not endeavour to get the commission for an opera here. If I compose really good music, indispensable in these days, it will be understood and valued in Germany. If I compose indifferent music it will be quickly forgotten in Germany, but here it would be often performed and extolled, and sent to Germany and given there on the authority of Paris, as we daily see. But I do not choose this, and if I am not capable of composing good music, I have no wish to be praised for it. So I shall first try Germany, and if things go so badly that I can no longer live there, I can then have recourse to some foreign country." With this resolve, one in every way redounding to the credit alike of his principles and policy, Mendelssohn quitted Paris, and (April, 1832) joined his brother Paul in London.

The "Proceedings" of the fifth session of the Musical Association are now printed and in the hands of the members. The list of members contains rather under 200 names. Many of them are amongst the most distinguished in science and in the musical profession; but, considering the low rate of subscription—only one guinea per annum—we ought to look forward to a considerable increase in the number of subscribers. The papers which have been read during the past session fairly represent the general and, we might say, the mixed aims of the Association. Lord Rayleigh and Mr. Spottiswoode have each read a paper on acoustical or purely scientific questions having a practical bearing on the construction of musical instruments. The discussion which followed Mr. Spottiswoode's paper on "Beats and Combination Tones" elicited valuable opinions in regard to the truth of the Helmholtzian theory of the "grave harmonic," a subject which, from the views expressed by Mr. Spottiswoode, appears to be still unsettled. Organ-builders and organists would be interested in the right definition of the term "drawing," that became a question in discussing Lord Rayleigh's experiments on the "Mutual Influence of Two Sounds nearly in Unison." Mr. Shelford Bidwell's paper on "Recent Inventions for Reproducing the Sound of the Human Voice" was amusingly illustrated by the telephone, the microphone, and phonograph; and from Mr. C. G. Saunders we have a short treatise on the very practical but little understood subject of the "Construction of Buildings in reference to Sound." The papers we have mentioned comprise the half of the eight provided for the session. The remaining four are on purely musical subjects, either from an historical, biographical, or technical point of view, and include Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley's paper on "The Early Italian and Spanish Treatises on Counterpoint and Harmony," Mr. G. A. Osborne's "Sketch of Berlioz," Mr. Prout's paper on the "Growth of the Modern Orchestra during the Past Century," and Mr. C. E. Stephens's paper on "Form in Musical Composition." It would be difficult to devise a better distribution of subjects, and it is to be hoped that members will freely circulate their copies of the printed Report so as to attract subscribers. An infusion of new elements will soon be the great want in the Musical Association. Its scope is limited, and the men are few who are capable or willing to discuss in public musico-scientific matters; and if the questions are practical, it is difficult to avoid hobbies and the advertisement of self or friends. In a place like London, with such a gigantic population, it is curious to turn over the reports of the discussions at the Musical Association, and find on certain subjects the same half-dozen names over and over again. It is possibly the same everywhere and in all Associations. The few men who come to the front are impelled by enthusiasm for special views, or by their consciousness of being able to talk without discredit, or by the necessity, from their professional position, of having to talk about something. If nothing amazing has come of it, sooner or later the occasion will arise when the collective wisdom of the Musical Association will be concentrated on some object of general utility. Already the Association has made an effort to draw the attention of the trustees of the British Museum to the "want of an index, catalogue, or other means of more ready reference" to the music and musical literature in that institution. The effort cannot be said to be wholly successful. It has, however, elicited a reply of some kind, and serves to remind the authorities and the world at large that there is a body of musical gentlemen amongst us taking notes. It is something to know from the trustees of the Museum that the separate catalogue of music comprises 372 volumes, and employs two cataloguers and two copyists in registering for the use of posterity the latest products of native genius. During the session of the Musical Association 1879-1880 the question of musical education will come to the fore as a result of Dr. Hullah's Report. The subject is a little mixed with a dangerous element, and perhaps the Committee of the Association may not desire to disturb the academic serenity of their meetings with polemics. Still it is a legitimate subject for investigation. The reading of a long rigmarole on musical education will be of little use. Two or three plain points in the question shortly laid before the members and their friends for discussion and votes are what is wanted. Such a proceeding in regard to public questions as they arise would convert the Musical Association into an active power, which may not be in conformity with its objects and constitution, but might very much contribute to its longevity. People—and, above all, English people—soon weary of essays.

The musical critic of the Queen has taken up his parable against the pretensions of promenade concerts, especially those at Covent Garden, to be anything better than mere amusements, or an excuse for miscellaneous gatherings. He laughs at the idea of regarding them as in any sense valuable from an art point of view, and intimates that the performance of symphonies and such like works is labour in vain, since the only effect upon those who listen at all is weariness or boredom. We do not agree with him. No doubt many persons frequent these entertainments with no thought of music in their minds, just as many others go to church for reasons having little to do with devotion. But the man who says that an average "promenade" audience does not care for good compositions and declines to listen to them, cannot know of what he is speaking. In the first place we may take for granted that persons who, like the Messrs. Gatti, risk their money in speculations of the kind, do not force upon the public ear obnoxious music, and that, if Beethoven's symphonies are played at Covent Garden, it is because they help to make up an attraction. But better proof than this is supplied by actual observation. We know nothing more hopeful and encouraging to those who desire the advance of public taste, than the aspect of the "promenade" when a really good work is being played. Although closely packed together, and having to stand, the people listen with an intentness which might profitably be imitated by those whose means command a comfortable seat. Some of the music, we grant, goes "over their heads" and is but vaguely comprehended, but every honest effort to hear intelligently marks a step in the education of him who makes it. Hardly therefore can we over-estimate the value of classical music at promenade concerts. It means the sowing of good seed on very miscellaneous ground, no doubt, but, though much may be wasted, a great deal is certain to take root in soil not otherwise easy to reach. We strongly advise the writer in the Queen to attend at Covent Garden a few nights and ascertain for himself on what false grounds his published opinion has been formed.

It has often been said that when a number of persons are doubtful of the truth of a certain circumstance, and one volunteers, from his own knowledge, to decide the point, he usually knows less about it than anybody else. Constantly do we meet with confirmations of the profundity of this remark, and perhaps on no subject more decisively than that of music. Passing over the assertions of the many writers on ancient music—so contradictory and yet all so positively stated—it is curious to note how events most confidently put forth as the result of much research by modern writers have afterwards been proved untrue. Fétis, for instance, at one time a recognised authority, has recently suffered much from those who have minutely examined into his "facts." From our own knowledge, we have in this journal shown how in one or two biographies of those eminent musicians with whom we were personally acquainted he has jumped to conclusions from mere hearsay evidence; and Carl Engel, in his papers on "The Literature of National Music," contributed to the MUSICAL TIMES, in speaking of Fétis's works, tells us that in his "Résumé philosophique" he is "quite sure" that the fiddle-bow originated in Europe, and in his "Recherches historiques," prefacing his Treatise on Antonio Stradiuarius, he is "quite sure" that it originated in Hindustan. Friederich von Drieberg, in his "Wörterbuch der griechischen Musik," published in Berlin, asserts, without the slightest authority, that the Greeks had a tonal system, scales even more true than our own, that they employed harmony, and that their musical instruments were most perfectly constructed. As we have said, it is only those really learned on any subject who are oppressed with doubts. A compiler of facts connected with celebrated violinists, for example, speaking of Lulli, says: "Our national anthem has been ascribed to him, but erroneously, having been composed in 1607 by Dr. John Bull, organist to James I., and the words by Ben Jonson." This assertion will amuse those who have read Mr. W. H. Cummings's articles on this subject published some few months back in the MUSICAL TIMES.

IT would of course be unnecessary to address any words of encouragement to the many who have carried off medals and other prizes at the annual musical examinations which have recently taken place; but those who, whilst striving their utmost to win tangible honours, have gone away for their summer holiday disappointed at what they may conceive their "want of success," will, we are certain, be glad to read the following extracts from the speech of Professor Huxley at the distribution of prizes to the boys of University College. "I do not doubt," he said, "that outside the list of prize-winners there may be boys of keener intellect than any who are in it, disqualified by lack of industry or lack of health; and there may be highly industrious boys who are unfortunately dull or sickly; and there may be athletes who are, still more unfortunately, either idle or stupid, or both." All persons whose lives are spent in preparing young persons for examinations must concur in the justice of these observations. The fact of obtaining a certain number of "marks," or of answering questions within a given time whilst seated with others at a table, may be accepted as a fair test of the readiness or physical endurance of students; but something must be allowed for those who, although extremely talented, are so nervously organised as to be thrown into a state of intellectual prostration during the whole examination; and it is within our own knowledge that many such pupils obtain a higher rank in after-life than some of those who have obtained the prizes. "Hence," says most truly Professor Huxley, "let none of you be discouraged. Those who have won prizes have made a good beginning; those who have not may yet make that good ending which is better than a good beginning. No life is wasted unless it ends in sloth, dishonesty, or cowardice. No success is worthy of the name unless it is won by honest industry and brave breasting of the waves of fortune." Surely these are crumbs of comfort for desponding students.

WE have no intention of re-criticising the musical merits of the Opera "H.M.S. Pinafore." Our opinion upon that work was given in this journal at the time of its production; and on a more intimate acquaintance with it we have never seen any reason to modify the remarks we then made. Neither should we stop to question for one moment the justice of the eulogiums which have been passed upon the Opera in America as long as they are written or spoken by persons whose convictions are based upon a sound knowledge of the subject upon which they are enlarging. But amongst the many fulsome notices we have read in American papers, nothing has, we think, equalled the absurdity of the following oration delivered at a recent public meeting in the States: "We know," said the speaker, "that in time past all has not been well between us. England has never understood us, never done us thorough justice. But the time has come for all this to be removed. England has made all straight. They taxed our tea (groans), but remember, they gave us the Pinafore (cheers). They made war upon us! But they gave us the Pinafore (cheers). They did not appreciate the glorious war which crushed slavery under foot—but we forgive them—for they gave us the Pinafore! (great cheering). American citizens, the time will come when the American eagle shall soar aloft with the union-jack in one talon and the stars and stripes in the other, and scream the glorious strains of that immortal Opera throughout the endless empyrean!" (Tremendous cheering, during which the band struck up "He is an Englishman!") We know that there are some authors who subsist upon flattery; but Mr. Sullivan is, we believe, too great an artist to swallow such flattery as this with equanimity.

A CORRESPONDENT living in a small country-town has addressed us in hopes that we may assist him in remedying a grievance; but considering that we seriously suffer from the same grievance ourselves, we scarcely think that we can be of any service to him. He says that for some time he has been "much afflicted with circulars from London, the greater part of which refer to two manufactures—one being sherry, the other pianofortes." With the former of these "manufactures" we are of course not inclined to interfere in the pages of this journal; but we certainly share our correspondent's surprise on reading in the circular which he incloses that an English maker, proud of the "degree of excellence" so obvious in the pianofortes of his manufacture, should impress upon those whom he addresses the fact that all his instruments "bear the name of Jules Lemoine and Sons." We are by no means astonished at the information contained in the circular that such pianofortes as are here offered "can only be obtained at £4 to £5 extra from other qualified makers," because, as the communication commences "Dear Sir," it is evident that the writer has some friendly feeling towards this resident in a country-town, and is resolved to let him have a first-rate instrument at a lower price than he must pay elsewhere; but we fail to comprehend why he should be ashamed of his own name. Our correspondent has not forwarded to us any specimen of the circulars announcing the superior sherry, to which he alludes; but our experience has proved that when a better-known name than that of the vendors is affixed to this article, the circumstance is never mentioned either in writing or in print.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

MESSRS. A. AND S. GATTI'S series of performances under the above title commenced at Covent Garden Theatre on the 9th ult., with every prospect of financial success. Artistically we are disposed to regard them leniently; for although the classical works occasionally given are performed amidst utterly antagonistic surroundings, there can be no doubt that the more good music is placed before the public the better. The French pianist, Madame Montigny-Rémaury, has created a marked effect upon those who would listen to her finished performances; and amongst the vocalists, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley may be cited in proof that the best vocal talent has been secured, although we cannot say that as a rule they have done more than sing down to the taste of the majority of their listeners. In the absence of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, the entire conductorship has devolved upon Mr. Cellier, who performs his arduous duties with much efficiency.

WE have received the following translation of an interesting Report in the "Musikalischen Wochenblatt," by Herr Concert-meister George Japha, of Cologne, on a new invention for improving the tone of all stringed instruments: "It is a well-known fact that the perfection to which the great Italian instrument-makers brought their art has never since their times been even approached, whilst in all other musical instruments, and especially in the piano, great and continued improvements have been made up to the present day: thus, the masterpieces of the old Italian makers have reached such an extreme price as to leave them almost unpurchasable by artists. This is partly owing to the careless manner in which repairs have been executed, partly to the neglect with which many owners have treated their instruments, but principally to the fact that during the past century wood has been scraped from their insides with the false notion that this operation improved the tone, whereas on the contrary irreparable injury has been done, and in consequence the greater number of the old instruments are weak in the wood. Attempts have been made in various ways to rectify these evils, but hitherto they have only been attended with partial success. Recently a most excellent invention has been introduced by Herr. A Spreuger, Court instrument-maker in Stuttgart, the object of which is to strengthen and improve the tone in every way, and the application of which I have found to be highly successful. The little simple and cheap apparatus is described by him as a (Tone-Schraube) tone-screw, and its use does not in the slightest manner endanger the instrument. Herr Spreuger has perfected the Tone-Schraube on the true principles of acoustics, and his own words may be here quoted to explain the mode of adapting it: 'My new invention consists of a species of auxiliary or second sound-post, which is introduced into the instrument, one end being brought into contact with the inside of the belly at the principal point of vibration, and the other resting upon a wooden bar which runs longitudinally along the instrument, one end coming through the button, and the other being fixed in the block which holds the neck of the instrument. The second sound-post is just one-tenth the length of the usual one, which of course remains in its normal position, whilst that of the second one is exactly under the middle of the bridge. The way in which the second sound-post and the long bar of wood are regulated is by a small screw which works through the button holding the tail-piece. By turning this screw from left to right the bar of wood, being arched upwards towards the under part of the belly, is still further pressed in the same direction, and the second sound-post is thus pressed firmer against the belly. This pressure can of course be increased or diminished until the best effect of tone is obtained.' The unanimously satisfactory reports of the success of the apparatus received from the most eminent professors in Stuttgart induced me to make a trial of it on my own concert instrument, a fine Guadagnini, but nevertheless having certain defects which I had in many other ways in vain endeavoured to remedy. The result far exceeded my expectation. My violin has eminently gained in fulness of tone, freedom of touch, and equality in all positions and on all the strings, and the result is alike in a large or small space truly astonishing. I therefore consider it but right to bring this invention to the notice of the owners of stringed instruments that may be weak in the wood or have otherwise suffered from the ravages of time, and I feel convinced that by doing so I am rendering a service to all my brother artists. I would especially draw attention to the absolute freedom from risk in adapting the apparatus, to its simplicity, and its trifling cost, which latter is, for violins, ten shillings; cellos, twenty shillings.; and for contra-basses, forty shillings. The address of Mr. Spreuger is Stuttgart, Gartenstrasse 34. One remark in conclusion. The 'tone-screw' has only to be fixed once in the proper position, and after an interval of fourteen days a continued improvement in the tone will be found to take place."

THE Examinations for Degrees in Music at the University of Oxford are appointed to take place as follows: 1. Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music. This examination will commence on Tuesday, October 14, at 10 A.M., in the Music School. In addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of Mozart's Symphony usually called "The Jupiter;" Mendelssohn's Cantata "Lauda Sion."—2. Examination for the Degree of Doctor in Music. This examination will commence at the same time and place as the above. Each of the above examinations will occupy at least two days. Candidates whose exercises have been approved, and who propose to offer themselves for either of these examinations, are to give in their names to Mr. George Parker, the Clerk of the Schools, on or before October 11, to pay the statutable fee of £2, and to exhibit their "Testamur" of having passed the previous examination.

THE death of Mr. James Howell, the eminent contra-bassist, which occurred during the last month, claims something more than a mere passing record. One of the "first eleven" male students at the Royal Academy of Music, he was placed under Anfossi, who at that time held a reputation only second to Dragonetti, and soon became a first-rate performer upon his instrument, and an excellent musician, thoroughly able to read and even play from score, the pianoforte indeed being for sometime his principal study. As an orchestral performer he was unrivalled, for not only was his admirable tone of the utmost importance in every first-class band; but his knowledge of the traditional method of accompanying recitative rendered his services at the Royal Italian Opera almost indispensable. For some years he had retired from the profession; but his memory will long be cherished by all who knew him, both as an accomplished artist and a kind-hearted and genial man.

WE are glad to find that the efforts of Mr. Frederick N. Löhr to promote the interests of the Plymouth Vocal Association—of which he has long been the Honorary Conductor—have been rewarded as they deserve, the last season having ended with a small balance in hand, for the first time since the formation of the Society. Nearly all the body of the hall is taken by subscribers; and as there is a complete orchestra, a fine organ, and the most eminent artists constantly appear at the concerts, there can be little doubt that the prosperity of the Association is now tolerably well ensured. For the coming season the works selected for performance are Haydn's "Creation," Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles," Benedict's "St. Peter," and Spohr's "Calvary."

AT St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, Oratorios will for the future be given every Sunday evening after the service, with full orchestra and augmented choir under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The Oratorios already announced are Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Spohr's "Last Judgment" and "Calvary," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," "St. Paul," and "Elijah," Handel's "Messiah," Haydn's "Creation," and Mozart's "Requiem."

THE Ninetieth Monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was held at the Grosvenor Hall on the 15th ult., the principal feature of the Concert being the "Allegro con brio" from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" arranged as a duet for two pianofortes, and well played by the Misses F. Hartley, Frame, and Dakin, and Mr. J. H. Maunder. Miss Agnes Ross sang Gounod's "O that we two were maying" and two other songs excellently, each being redemanded. The other vocalists were Miss Giles, Mr. Arthur Weston, and Mr. Thomas Nettleship. The choral selections, including Schumann's "Gipsy life," Hatton's "The Sailor's song," W. Macfarren's "Shepherds all." were efficiently rendered. Mr. Henry Baker conducted.

THE instrumental works to be performed at the forthcoming Bristol Musical Festival will include Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor (Scotch); Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; Beethoven's Grand Concerto in E flat (The Emperor), for pianoforte and orchestra; a Gavotte and Minuet for pianoforte and orchestra, by Raff; the Garden-Scene and Dance from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding;" the Overtures to "Euryanthe" (Weber), "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn), and "Anacreon" (Cherubini); and the Introduction to the first and third acts of Wagner's "Lohengrin." The band will consist of eighty performers; Conductor, Mr. Charles Hallé.

THE decease of Mrs. Sartoris during the past month will recall to the memory of many amateurs her great success on the operatic stage as Adelaide Kemble. Her brilliant reception in "Norma" at once established a fame which was increased by her excellent acting, as well as singing, in many other well-known parts. She was married to Mr. Sartoris in 1843, and, finally retiring from the stage, became also eminent in literature, her novel "A Week in a French Country-House" having made a highly favourable impression. Mrs. Sartoris was a daughter of Mr. Charles Kemble, and sister of Mrs. Butler, better known as Fanny Kemble.

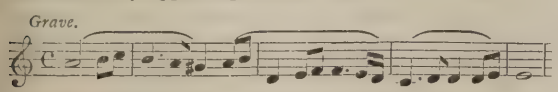
THE Second Examination for Mus. B. degree at the University of Cambridge will take place in December. Candidates who have passed the first examination (the preliminary) and who intend proceeding to the second examination must place their exercises in the hands of Professor Macfarren on or before October 1.

REVIEWS.

Out of Darkness (Aus der Tiefe), Psalm 130. For Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra. Composed by George Henschel (Op. 30). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HERR HENSCHEL is known amongst us as a singer not less than he deserves to be, but, as a composer, only a few of his smaller works—songs and such like—have hitherto recommended him to favour. It is right that this failure of justice should be made good. Herr Henschel is something more than a producer of musical trifles, and the public generally will wake up to the fact, when the work before us (now for the first time available with an English text, if not for the first time published) becomes dispersed over the country. We do not hesitate to say that the German vocalist's setting of "De profundis," is a notable addition to our store of sacred music. It is marked by earnestness, power, and skill, in combination with intense expression; and it induces us to look to Herr Henschel for further examples, perhaps on a larger and grander scale, of the same undoubted talent.

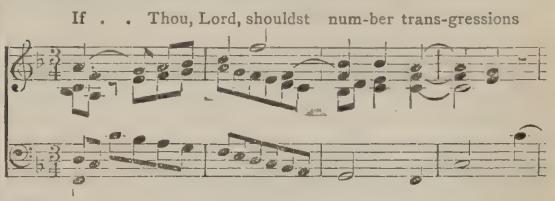
The Psalm, as a musical piece, is divided into five numbers, beginning with a chorus (Grave, A minor), "Out of darkness call I unto Thee." This is preceded by an orchestral introduction, written very much in the style of Bach—that is to say, with a free and independent motion of real parts. One phrase here stands out prominently, beginning and ending the introduction as well as once intermediately appearing in the bass:—



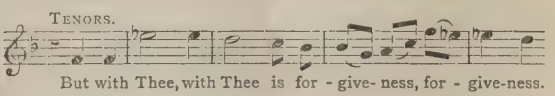
Thus reiterated, the phrase appears to us as embodying the prayer for deliverance which it heralds and, as we shall see, accompanies. The voices enter, pp, in solemn diatonic harmony (five parts), and the whole of the exordium constituted by this Grave movement is as impressive as befits the subject. After a pause on the dominant comes a Moderato, in the key of the Grave, beginning fugally as thus:—

This subject "flies" in proper form through all the parts, and is slightly developed before a subordinate subject enters—

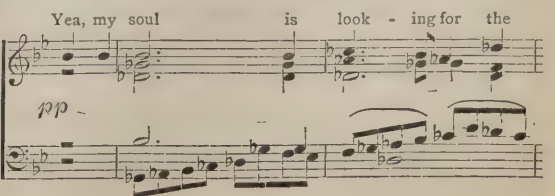
leading to a brief but strenuous ensemble on the words "Hear Thou me," which closes in G minor. Then come an episode (più mosso) for four solo voices and a resumption of the fugal theme with its subordinate. In the Coda of the number the subject of the orchestral introduction is again heard. By this time we are conscious of the composer's power. He does not startle, but he enlists our interest and secures attention for whatever may follow. The second number is a Trio (Andante, F) by no means so completely in accord with the sentiment of its text as the opening chorus. "If Thou, Lord, shouldst number transgressions, who shall abide it?"—such is the theme, one not to be contemplated without awe and fear. Herr Henschel, for reasons doubtless sufficient in his own eyes, takes a different view of it, and his music reflects complacency and content rather than the emotions just named. A few bars will suffice by way of proof:—



The result of this is that when the composer arrives at the comforting thought, "But with Thee is forgiveness," he has no contrast to offer. Subjoined is the new theme based upon a pedal dominant of its key:—



Waiving the point just criticised—an important point as it seems to us—no fault can be found with the Trio, which is a good example of smooth writing, the parts flowing easily, and each presenting a fair share of melodic interest. In No. 3 we have an unaccompanied five-part chorus (Moderato, B flat) distinguished by more change of key and difficulty of passage than unaccompanied choruses usually show. Its most distinctive feature appears simultaneously with an abrupt transition from B flat to G flat:—



The rest of the chorus, which, as a whole is decidedly effective, calls for no special remark. No. 4 takes the form of a bass solo (Andante sostenuto, D minor) on the words, "Israel, hope thou in the Lord." Here we meet with a decided reflection of Mendelssohn in his smoothest and most agreeable mood. The entire solo may be taken as represented by the following passage—its second subject:—

Bass singers will assuredly not turn away from this number, which is as pleasant to sing as it is agreeable to hear. We come now to the final chorus (Allegro ma non troppo, A major) "And He shall Israel His people." This opens fugally with a bold subject—which runs in due order through all the five parts, followed by an ensemble and a full close. At this point Herr Henschel takes a hint from Handel's great "Amen Chorus," and gives subject and answer to the violins alone. This, in fact, leads to a spirited, well-worked episode on the word "Amen," the episode and the fugal theme being the materials out of which the whole of a very important number is developed. Herr Henschel appears at his best here, and reveals powers of a higher order than we had previously any reason to expect; and as a whole, we repeat, the Psalm is a work of power and skill, deserving the respectful notice of connoisseurs.

Berceuse, Méditation et Valse pour le Piano. Par Oliver King. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is always satisfactory to find a young composer entering upon his career not only with youthful ardour and exuberance of expression, but in pursuit of a lofty ideal. Ardour and exuberance belong to youth, but the lofty ideal is not always discerned, or, if discerned, not invariably followed up with the conscientiousness necessary to its attainment. On the one hand perhaps a prospect of cheap success tempts from the true path, or self-indulgence stands in the way of sacrifice, or a feeling arises that there will be time enough in the future for the seriousness out of which only highest results can spring. Examples of this are not wanting in the experience of any of us, and biography records too many cases in which men of brilliant means have accomplished little or nothing, and wasted the talent that should have been put out to usury. Not in all instances, however, may we blame the subjects of such failure. It sometimes happens that the exigencies of a very matter-of-fact world come between the ideal and him who would pursue it. Ambitious young men cannot exist upon their ambition. To live is, with them as with others, the supreme necessity; and the highest good in the future has often to be abandoned for that which, though of far less value, ministers to present needs. These remarks are fairly suggested by the three pianoforte pieces now before us. We have here the work of a young man just started upon the active duties of his profession, and we have here, also, the result of high aims and thorough conscientiousness. Looking at the ability displayed, it does not seem likely that works of this calibre embody Mr. King's loftiest aspirations. He intends, no doubt, to indulge those aspirations on a far larger and more important scale as experience grows and a consciousness of power gives boldness. If this be so, it is all the more creditable that even with comparative trifles Mr. King takes loving pains; bestowing upon them his very best skill, and elaborating each with as much earnestness as though by it alone the world would judge him. Let us hope that he may have both the will and the power to continue as he has begun. Temptations will undoubtedly assail him.

> O stay, the maiden said, and rest
> Thy weary head upon this breast;

but the youth who bore the banner with the strange device pressed on, and found death on the mountain-top far better than inglorious ease below. We wish all our young composers would be equally heedless of siren voices by the wayside, and preserve to the end the determination with which they set out. Nothing else can save them. Art rejects divided worship and lukewarm affection. It demands votaries, and less than a votary it will not reward.

Basing our judgment upon present indications, and assuming his steadfastness in the path now entered, we think that much may be expected from Mr. Oliver King. His faults are simply those incidental to youth, and along with them are merits in advance of his years. For proof of this any one of the three pieces may be taken. In the Berceuse, a short Andantino (G flat major) of thirty-two bars only, we notice a slight tendency to over-elaboration, but there is genuine sentiment in the music and that order of beauty which belongs to true poetry. The movement everywhere suggests tenderness and peace, without once approaching commonplace expression. Moreover, its structure will bear examination. It is not like so many other things of the kind, merely an accompanied melody, but shows true polyphony, the part-writing being clear, fluent, and effective from first to last. The Meditation, an Andante con moto in F sharp minor, assumes larger dimensions, and, perhaps, is of a more popular character than the Berceuse. But the composer keeps as far as ever from the ordinary ruts, and insists on taking his own course. The melody has a pronounced individuality, and here and there Mr. King treats it with a boldness always interesting, if not in every case deserving of unqualified admiration. But even where thorough approval must be withheld, one cannot but see with delight the evidence of a resolve to keep above the common forms of musical utterance. Mr. King hates stock phrases, and will do anything rather than condescend to them. The Valse is the longest of the three pieces, and is a glorified example (after Chopin's manner, without being Chopinish) of the popular dance measure. Brimful of melody, it will be more readily appreciated than either of its companions, but more than a taste for a waltz theme is necessary to appreciate the details of its structure. Here Mr. King has put forth considerable ingenuity without spoiling the charm of his subject-matter by excess of elaboration, and, once more, his polyphonic style comes into effective prominence. The waltz has only to be heard in order to be admired as a singularly able specimen of its class. But admirable as all the three pieces are in themselves, many will regard them with the greater interest on account of the promise they give of a composer who is thoughtful as well as fluent, and who has really something to say.

Elementary Lessons on Sound. By Dr. W. H. Stone, Lecturer on Physics at St. Thomas's Hospital. [Macmillan and Co., London, 1879.]

This little work reminds us of certain foreign publications of the kind on popular science. Its object, as stated in the preface, is to furnish information intermediate between acoustics and music proper, supplementary to both. It forms one of Macmillan's series of "school class-books." The clear arrangement of the matter and the conciseness of style are well adapted to the purpose for which it is written. It is divided into seven or eight chapters under general headings, such as the Production and Propagation of Sound, Consonance, Pitch, Quality, &c., and these are subdivided into headed paragraphs in which we find at once the particular information we are in search of. Intermediate, as the author says, between music and acoustics, it forms a dictionary of the "mechanics of music" with the meaning and explanation of everything from the longitudinal, torsional, or lateral vibration of rod, air, or string to the finished musical instrument. Of many of the instruments, such as the horn, flute, clarionet, and hautbois, we have engravings; and the sixty-seven illustrations the work contains are all excellent. Dr. Stone's "Elementary Lessons" is a miniature book of reference which many men of considerable reading on the subject it treats will be only too glad to consult. As he reminds us, much of the material is only to be found in bulky, expensive, and foreign treatises, and the rest is practically concealed in memoirs and transactions of scientific Societies.

Acoustical discoveries have lately made stupendous strides; and it is curious to reflect that books which are not only modern but comparatively recent publications could not contain the descriptions Dr. Stone gives us of the telephone, the microphone, the phonautograph, and the phonograph. He gives us also an account of the latest experiments and appliances in tonometry by Mr. Ellis, Lord Rayleigh, Appunn, and others. He treats specially of the effects of temperature and moisture on string or wire; and of organ-pipes, particularly stopped pipes, in regard to which the law of Bernoulli has been corrected by Mr. Bosanquet. These questions have a direct application to music, either in respect to the mechanism of musical instruments or the performance of music. Most of the information can be found in other and larger works, but we have it here altogether in a very condensed and convenient form. The chapter on "Scales, Chords, and Temperament," as well as some other chapters, are pretty much the same as in Dr. Stone's "Scientific Basis of Music" in Novello's Series of "Music Primers." We have again the now familiar illustrations of newly invented keyboards for modifying the imperfections of organs and harmoniums; and Dr. Stone repeats in his present work the "Development of Scale from Harmonic Series." If "development" does not mean derivation, and if "from harmonic series" implies plurality, then we understand it; but the "demonstration" Dr. Stone has borrowed from Mr. Colin Brown is a century and a quarter old, and has been given more concisely and correctly, inasmuch as some of the higher numbers are indirect derivatives, as was elaborately shown by Mr. Hewitt. Besides, it all amounts to the time-honoured "three fundamentals" and their triads, and Dr. Stone has not got it right yet. In his example, page 120, the printers have placed the note C♮ over the seventh partial of F, and the harmonic 6 is "marked with a cross," a badge of non-election intended for its neighbour.

We wish we had space to quote some of Dr. Stone's remarks on the education and sensibility of the ear, and on the connection of tonal memory or the power of distinguishing absolute pitch, a faculty he thinks mixed with what has been lately recognised as the sixth sense, namely, the "muscular sense." His remarks and quotations under each heading are necessarily short, but he has the faculty of picking out essentials, so that in the driest of explanations his style is never prosy, or wanting in interest to the most cursory among general readers.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Set to music in the key of C. By Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., Mus. Bac., Oxon, Organist of Chester Cathedral. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This work is in one sense a pièce d'occasion, having been composed specially for use at the festival services recently held in Chester Cathedral. An orchestra was used on that occasion, and Mr. Bridge naturally took advantage of its presence to increase the now fast-growing list of church music which recognises other instruments than the organ. But while doing this he seems to have carefully avoided writing in such a fashion as to make an orchestra essential. The accompaniments, as arranged for the organ, are in all respects suited to that instrument; and while there cannot be a doubt that their orchestral effect is the best, it would be hard to say, from an examination of the organ score, that they were not originally conceived in that form. Mr. Bridge did well, even in view of a special occasion, thus to make his work suitable for use under ordinary circumstances, and we are bound to say that success of a very marked character has attended his efforts. It was pointed out by our special correspondent at the Chester Festival that both the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis aimed at general utility through the medium of a thoroughly popular style. The impression thus formed on first acquaintance is confirmed by fuller knowledge. Mr. Bridge's work may be fitly described as "taking." It is nowhere pretentious, never exaggerated in character, or calculated to excite a suspicion that the composer is striving after effect for effect's sake. It therefore gives no countenance to a movement (the beginnings of which are obvious) destined, if it go on, to impregnate church music with the peculiar qualities that excite so much debate and, in some minds, so much regret, when displayed in secular works of the "modern school." Mr. Bridge, judging by the example before us, is satisfied to be orthodox, while combining with orthodoxy, in perfectly natural and legitimate union, the free expression and more decided musical sentiment called for by the taste of the day. In both the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis we have therefore a happy mingling of science and feeling—an avoidance, on the one hand, of the barrenness of mere technique, and on the other a strong purpose not to break loose from traditions which embody, let us hope for all time, the canons of religious music. This is the juste milieu that every church composer should keep in mind, and that, we are happy to believe, few among them wholly neglect. Its value receives striking exemplification in the Magnificat before us, where the rigidity of the old school and the freedom of the new make mutual concessions to prove, as it were, that they are not antagonistic, but capable of being wrought into a perfect whole. But the chief merit here, as in the Nunc dimittis, is an intimate relationship between the music and the sacred text. Mr. Bridge clearly has the faculty of feeling his subject, and of giving natural expression to it through the medium of his art. Hence no one can say of this music that it would suit almost any other serious words just as well. The union is an unforced one, and it constitutes a success far greater than could be achieved by ever so masterly a composition wanting the same harmony. We should add that nowhere does Mr. Bridge, in his praiseworthy effort to write that which shall be popular, approach the vulgar or commonplace. He is free, but dignified as far as the exalted nature of his theme demands, and we may hope that, standing now but little beyond the threshold of his career, he will enrich church music with many another work showing equal judgment and taste.

The Pianoforte Pupil Teacher. By Horace Cambridge.

We know not whether this work is issued to the public; but as no publisher's name is printed on the title-page, we are perhaps supposed to conclude that opinions are sought upon its merits by sending it for review before submitting it to a more practical test of its value. That the author does not follow in the beaten track we willingly admit; but what is new is not always better than what is old; and notwithstanding, therefore, that we are told in the preface, as a fundamendal truth, that it is good to study "that which is easy before that which is difficult," Mr. Cambridge must remember that, although his "diagram"—upon which he evidently prides himself—looks very well upon paper, it is only by a long course of practice in teaching that its real efficacy can be tested. For ourselves, we confess a leaning to the belief that the "connection between the stave and the instrument" is better shown by the usual process of placing notes upon lines and in spaces, and pointing out their situation by directing the eye from keyboard to note, than by drawing lines from each key into a blank staff, and learning their names afterwards, not to dwell upon the fact that in this diagram the notes in the spaces are not even alluded to. Again, we cannot think it is good to talk to children about "rather long" and "rather short" notes; for at the very first they should be taught the exact length of all they meet with; it may not be advisable, for example, to teach a very young person the value of every coin, but when you do begin to do so, surely the plan of saying that a sixpenny piece is "rather less valuable" than a shilling, or a half-crown "rather more valuable" than a florin, cannot be recommended. In section two we have a very extraordinary exercise for acquiring the value of notes. The student is told to "say 'John Smith,' at the same time striking the middle C," afterwards to "strike once for John and once for Smith," then to "strike twice for John and twice for Smith," and finally to "strike four times for John and four times for Smith," and this is to teach him the semibreve, minim, crotchet, and quaver; but considering that there is nothing to prevent his saying "John Smith" in four different spaces of time, we fail to see how he can acquire the relative lengths of each note. It is true that to the eye the enigma is properly solved; but it is the ear that should be trained to measure time; and for this purpose we know no system so efficacious as audible counting. The exercises for acquiring independence of finger are extremely good, and there is a well-considered glossary of the usual terms employed in music for the pianoforte. What, however, can be meant by saying that the C clef on the third line of the staff is called the Tenor clef, and on the fourth line the Alto clef, we cannot comprehend. Neither can we at all understand the example of what is termed "The Great Clef," unless the word "Clef" is printed in place of "Staff." We must also dissent from the assertion that a scale consists of the "degrees or semi-degrees of a key played in regular succession." Surely there are no "semi-degrees" of a key; from one step to another must be a "degree" of the scale, although these steps are irregular. In conclusion, we give every credit to Mr. Cambridge for the earnestness of purpose apparent throughout his book. Some minor inaccuracies we have pointed out could, of course, be easily remedied; but we can scarcely suppose that the author will agree with our strictures upon his novel methods of teaching.

Selections from the Versets of George Muffat. An Extract from "Der General-Bass in der Composition" of Johann David Heinichen, Chapel-master to the King of Poland, 1717. The Fly. Extract from the same work. Edited by N. S. Heineken. [Sidmouth.]

BEYOND the simple announcement upon the title-page, "Sidmouth, 1878," we have nothing to indicate where these highly interesting extracts from the works of two composers now almost forgotten are to be procured—nor indeed are we certain that they are to be procured at all. In the letter from the editor which accompanied the compositions we are told that a rare manuscript of the once celebrated George Muffat having come into his possession, and also the great work of Johann David Heinichen, he has "endeavoured to keep their memories alive by printing these specimens from their works"; and he adds that, if we think them worth notice, our "influence may be powerful to induce others to make search and give to the world some of the greater works both of Muffat and Heinichen." George Muffat was an eminent organist and composer, and one of the greatest theorists of Germany at the end of the seventeenth century; and the "Versets" from which the present selection is made consist of twelve Toccate, each of which is followed by six Fugues. In the British Museum is a manuscript copy of Muffat's Sonatas, from which, it is stated, Handel has borrowed. The quotations here given from the "Versets" sufficiently show that he was an excellent contrapuntist; and although the so-called "Fugues" do not average more than a dozen bars each, they are well written, a Tonal Fugue in D minor especially being a very fair example of the composer's skill. Dr. Burney, in his history and travels, speaks highly of the talent, learning, and compositions of Heinichen, who was styled by Marpurg the "Rameau of Germany." He was born at Crössuln, near Weissenfels, April 17, 1683, and died at Dresden, July 16, 1729. His best work, "Der General-Bass in der Composition," is a thick quarto volume of 988 pages, very rudely and often incorrectly printed; and the extract here given appears in the work as an example of accompanying a florid bass. The harmonies are exceedingly ingenious, and the counterpoint flows throughout with much freedom. The second extract is given in the work as an example for the treatment of the chord of the sixth. To this the editor has adapted words, also of an olden date, by Bourn. Whether it would not have been better to allow the music to appear in its original form is a question; because in reality such pieces derive their interest from the quaintness of style which stamps the period in which they were written, and any attempt to tamper with them, therefore, destroys their character. The editor says, "Can any musical enthusiast be induced to resuscitate some of the works, masses for instance, of this learned writer?" We shall be glad indeed if these publications should stimulate any art-lover to the performance of so worthy an act.

Six Songs. By Joseph F. Duggan. Being a First Series of Rhythmic Tentatives. Opus 1. [Weekes and Co.]

"RHYTHM alone is sufficient to recast the entire fount of musical idea." This is the motto printed prominently on the first page of these compositions; and we may of course conclude, therefore, that the axiom embodied in these words was ever present to Mr. Duggan in the performance of his task. Greater minds than that of the composer of these six songs have been crippled by working in self-imposed fetters; and seeing how very much merit there is in the vocal pieces avowedly framed to illustrate an idea, we cannot help thinking how much better they would have been had the author been free to write as he pleased. No. 1, "Anacreon's Ode to Temperance," beginning with a bold Recitative in C minor, is one of the best of the series, the frequent alterations of rhythm illustrating the words with much effect; and No 2, "The Elleree," is melodious, vocal, and unlaboured throughout. But in No. 3, "The Lily of the Lake," the composer has evidently thought it time to astonish us with a novelty in rhythm, and so he starts in 7-4. Now this looks very scientific; but when it is sung it of course sounds, as it should have been written, in alternate bars of C. and 3-4, a method adopted by all who know that a measure of 5 or 7 can never be felt by an audience. But this song is more curious than pleasing, for we have 7-4, 6-4, C., 3-4, 7-4, C., 3-4, 7-4, and 6-4 in the space of six pages; and we need scarcely say, therefore, that the principle upon which Mr. Duggan worked has been tolerably well adhered to in the setting of words which unfortunately hardly seem to lend themselves kindly to such treatment. No 4, "La Lusinga," is a good song in D minor and major, a triplet accompaniment running effectively throughout, and many of the passages being remarkably forcible and appropriately impassioned. No. 5, "Filomela," gains much character by a syncopated accompaniment, the melody being extremely melodious and placid; and No. 6, "Dallo Profonde," accompanied almost throughout with an effective four-part chorus, has a theme for the principal voice happily expressive of the words. As we have said, the evident desire to gain power by peculiarity of rhythm somewhat detracts from the attractiveness of these compositions; but on the whole they are welcome additions to our stock of modern vocal music, and we recommend them to all who desire something above the average songs of the day.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE performances during last month of the Paris Grand-Opéra have consisted chiefly of Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," Weber's "Freischütz," and Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète" and "Les Huguenots," a number of more or less interesting revivals being in course of realisation under the new régime of M. Vaucorbeil. The new director, who evinces great activity in the administration of the national institution placed under his care, has signified his intention to increase the salaries of the lesser-paid members of the Opéra; undoubtedly a reformatory effort directed to the proper quarter, where the evils of the modern operatic "star" system are most keenly felt. In a letter addressed to his régisseur-général, M. Meyer, requesting that a scheme should be submitted to him in furtherance of this proposal, M. Vaucorbeil says: "Although certain engagements will doubtless tell heavily upon my budget of expenditure, it is nevertheless unjust that the artists forming that artistic body which is indispensable for the worthy interpretation of masterpieces should be allowed to suffer from the existing incongruous state of things. If at the outset of my directorial career I cannot afford to be prodigal, it is my duty to endeavour to be equitable." M. Vaucorbeil's début in his new functions promises well for the future of the leading operatic stage of France.

The minor lyrical establishments of the French capital are about to reopen their doors for the approaching season. In addition to those already accredited to the public, a small theatre, hitherto known as the Théâtre Taitbout, will shortly be opened for the performances of one-act comic operas and operettas only, the avowed object being to afford an opportunity to obscure composers and lyrical artists of talent to introduce themselves to public notice. The new institution, which is to be called the Nouveau-Lyrique, is under the direction of M. Léon Vasseur, the composer of "La Timbale d'Argent," and its opening performance will consist of the following one-act comic operas, viz.: "La Princesse Jaune" (Saint-Saëns), "M'sieu Landry" (Duprato), and "Les Petits Prodiges" (E. Jonas). On the other hand the project of the foundation of a People's Theatre, for the performances of opera and drama, is being actively discussed in Paris musical circles, and the Municipal Council has already voted a subvention of 200,000 francs for an Opéra-Populaire, and a further 100,000 francs for a Théâtre-Populaire-Dramatique, the two to form in reality one institution. The scheme awaits, as yet, the sanction of the Chambers.

The valuable collection of musical instruments hitherto in the possession of M. Tolbecque, and a portion of which formed part of the historical collection exhibited last year at the Trocadéro, has just been acquired, by purchase, by the Belgian Government.

M. Gounod is said to have sold the score of his new Opera "Le Tribut de Zamora" to the Paris music-publisher, M. Choudens, under the following conditions: The composer receives the sum of 50,000 francs upon closing the contract, and half that amount again after the fiftieth and seventy-fifth performances respectively, being 100,000 francs in all for the right of publication alone, and irrespective, of course, of the tantième he will derive from each representation. It is curious, and not a little melancholy also, to reflect that a little more than half the sum about to be obtained by the favourite French composer for the copyright of one opera suffices to cover the sum-total of pecuniary gain derived by C. M. von Weber from his entire operatic works, including "Freischütz," "Euryanthe," and "Oberon." Such is the prestige enjoyed by popularly recognised talent in these latter days!

The Prefect of the Department of the Seine, M. Hérold, a son of the composer of "Zampa," has undertaken the reorganisation of school-singing in his department, the Commission appointed for that purpose including MM. Gounod, Thomas, Massenet, Masset, Reber, as well as many other professors of eminence, a fact which sufficiently indicates the importance attached by M. Hérold to this branch of education.

Amateurs intending to visit Bayreuth next year, in order to witness the projected first representation of Herr Wagner's already so-much-talked-of "Parsifal," will hear with regret that the performance of this latest music-drama of the reformer has again been postponed sine die. A recent number of the Bayreuther Blätter publishes the following declaration of the poet-composer, addressed to the members of the Society of Patrons of the Bayreuth undertaking: "Those members of our Society who have followed my reports on our position will scarcely be altogether taken by surprise if I announce to-day that the performance of 'Parsifal' cannot yet take place in 1880. I consider it my duty, however, to make this declaration expressly, in order on the one hand to avoid misunderstandings, and on the other to enable those who have joined merely in the anticipation of the projected performance next year, and not in manifestation of their sympathy with the general tendency of the Society, to withdraw from it with the option of having the amount of their contributions refunded to them. It will be reserved for the increase and strengthening of our Society to enable me, when finally determining the period of the performance in question, to announce at the same time the inauguration of an undertaking having for its object the periodical repetition of the 'Bühnen-Festspiele.'"

The interest exhibited on the part of the German musical public as regards Herr Wagner's gigantic "Tetralogy" is evidently on the increase, and performances of the work, or of portions of it, appear to be accompanied by financial success also. Thus, at the Mannheim Theatre, seven representations of "Rheingold" and "Walküre" have resulted in a net profit to the institution, the total receipts, according to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, being 48,400 marks. At Vienna, the performances of the entire "Ring des Nibelungen" will be resumed next month, Herr Jäger being again retained for the part of Siegfried.

An heroic Opera in four acts entitled "Pierre Robin," by Oscar Bolck, has just been performed with much success at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater.

We read the following anecdote in the Berlin Echo: "The relatives, living at Wiesbaden, of our countryman Professor August Wilhelmj have lately received the copy of a portrait-group taken at Omaha (Nebraska), wherein the violin-king is represented together with the Sioux chief 'She-rar-root-cowy' (He who deals the first blow) and his family. The brown warrior is said to have entreated the 'Sha-his-ta-ka-shush-ta-rook-tu-ra-he' (The chief whose music touches the hearts) to have his portrait taken in his company."

Herr Nessler's Opera "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln," which had attracted the attention of amateurs on the occasion of its first performance in the early part of the present year at Leipzig, will be brought out with an Italian translation at Turin, a French version of the libretto being likewise contemplated. An article in the Paris Temps, giving an analysis of the work, contains the following passage: "It will be seen that the Germans have retained the custom of making a much more frequent use of the marvellous in their operas than is the case in France, and that consequently we must not apply exactly the same standard to a French libretto and to a German operatic poem, especially since the one under notice is founded upon what we call a fairy-tale."

Dr. Franz Liszt, the most remarkable pianist of our time, better known to the younger generation of amateurs as the Abbé Liszt, poet, composer and genial musical author, has had another ecclesiastical dignity conferred upon him. Pope Leo XIII. has, it is stated, nominated the eminent Hungarian veteran musician honorary canon (canonico onorario) of the cathedral of Albano, the see of Cardinal Hohenlohe, himself a musical amateur of considerable attainments.

Anton Rubinstein is expected at Hamburg, to conduct the rehearsals of his Opera "Nero," which will shortly be produced there.

The Annual Report of the Conservatorium for Music and Dramatic Art at Vienna, says the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, bears witness to the flourishing condition of that institution, which during the school-year of 1878-1879 numbered 742 pupils. No less than fifty-two professors, under the direction of Herr Josef Helmesberger, constitute the permanent teaching body. The course of instruction comprises singing and the usual orchestral instruments, as well as the theory of the art in all its branches, besides which modern languages, mythology, history of music and literary history, dramatic representation, recitation, dancing, fencing, and gymnastics are being taught in the various departments of the institution, which enjoys the support of the aristocracy and of wealthy private inhabitants of the Austrian capital. Of musical performances eighty were held for orchestra, sixty for chamber-music, and twenty-five for mixed choir during the year.

During the projected historical performances of Mozart's operas, to be given this winter at Vienna, leading parts will be taken by Mesdames Pauline Lucca, Schuch-Proska, and Bianchi.

M. Alexandre Zarzycki is announced to have accepted the directorship of the Warsaw Conservatoire, in the room of Apollinaire de Kontski, whose death was noticed in our last number.

The Annual Meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musiker-Verband was announced to be held from the 26th to the 28th ult., at Breslau, among the principal subjects proposed for discussion being the foundation of a publishing establishment in connection with the Society.

A monument, the work of Herr Donndorf, to be erected at the grave of Robert Schumann, will be inaugurated at Bonn during next month.

Herr Joachim Raff is said to have just completed a new Symphony, which will be the ninth of the fertile composer's similar works.

After an interruption of four years, the annual Music Festivals of the Swiss Cantons will be revived next spring, when the confederate choirs will assemble at Zurich.

We have much pleasure in drawing the attention of our readers (at the bidding of a competent correspondent) to the artistic activity displayed by the Choral Society of Turin under the able direction of a sterling musician, Signor Giulio Roberti. During the short period of its existence (it was founded in 1875 by the late Signor Tempia) the Society, it appears, has devoted itself to the performance of a number of classical masterpieces of both older and modern schools; and the concerts being much frequented and appreciated, there can be no doubt that the Society is exercising a healthy and stimulating influence upon the musical life of Turin. We shall follow Signor Roberti's artistic efforts with sincere interest.

The Maestro Usiglio's Opera "Le Donne Curiose" was performed with much success at Milan. In consequence of the favourable reception accorded to the work in Italy, the publisher of the opera, Sonzogno, has commissioned the composer to write another opera buffa for him, which the maestro, inspired by success and the orders of his publisher, has promised to complete at the beginning of next year.

Mercuri's Opera "Il Violino del Diavolo," already successfully produced in Italy, has recently gained much applause at Madrid, the fact being probably due as much to the double talent of vocalist and violinist displayed by Madame Carolina Ferni, for whom the opera was originally written, as to the intrinsic merits of the work.

We have to record the death, at the age of seventy-two, of M. A. Thys, composer of several popular operettas and for many years an able contributor to the columns of the Paris music journal Le Ménéstrel.

M. Paul de Chazot, author of several operatic libretti, and translator, in conjunction with MM. Nuitter and Beaumont, of the text-book of Weber's "Oberon," has just died at Paris.

The death is also announced of Julius Schmock, "Dom-Sänger" at Berlin, and much esteemed as a vocal artist of eminence.

Paris.—Last Organ Concert of M. Alexandre Guilmant, at the Trocadéro (August 3): Prelude, E minor (Bach); Concerto in F (Handel); Double Fugue, G minor (Eberlin); "Danse des Sylphes" (Berlioz); Scherzo capriccioso (Guilmant); Gavotte (Martini); Improvisation, by the Concert-giver. Vocal soli.

Dresden.—Operatic Concert at the Conservatorium (August 2): Scenes from "Le Nozze di Figaro" (Mozart); "Trovatore" (Verdi); "Magic Flute" (Mozart); "Stradella" (Flotow); "Hans Heiling" (Marschner).

Leipzig.—Concert of the Musikverein (August 2): "Nordische Heerfahrt" (E. Hartmann); "Rouet d'Omphale," symphonic-poem (Saint-Saëns); Last Movement from Symphony in C (Schubert); Meditation for harp and stringed orchestra (Bach-Gounod); Overture, "Freischütz" (Weber); Triumphal March (R. MUSIC IN DRESDEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The Hoftheater here opened for the season on the first of this month, giving alternate play and opera. Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil" was announced for the commencing opera; but at the last moment (owing to the indisposition of the singer who was to have been the Bertrand) it was changed for "Lucia di Lammermoor," which was only moderately well executed. The second opera performed was "Aennchen von Tharau," by Heinrich Hofman; the music of which is quite new to me, and which I found charmingly elegant and graceful. It is a village story; a pastor's daughter who inspires a passionate attachment in a sedate professor of theology and in a student youth of the same university. When the professor obtains the pastor's sanction to his suit, the daughter dutifully accepts her father's choice, which renders so desperate the enamoured student youth that he closes with the offer of a recruiting officer who passes through the village, enlists in his troop, and departs for the wars. The pastor's daughter, Aennchen, discovers too late that she has unconsciously returned the love of her student admirer, and confides to her friend Gretchen her misery at finding herself engaged to marry the sedate professor. This latter is magnanimous as well as passionately attached; so that when—on the return of his youthful rival, wounded and forlorn, exciting in the destined bride uncontrollable evidence of her pity and affection—the truth is discovered, the professor renounces his own hopes of happiness and joins the hands of the young couple. Fräulein Malten, who sang the part of Aennchen, seemed nervous and little at ease; but our sprightly acquaintance of the Salzburg Musikfest, Frau Schuch-Proska, was the Gretchen, and sang with spirit and gaiety the two lively songs and other music allotted to her in this Operetta. Herr Bulsz (the professor) has a fine rich baritone voice, which is perfectly under his command, and which he uses with a steadiness of tone and a proper taking of breath that are perfectly delightful, after the bawling and trembling that we are too often treated with by singers of the present day. Herr Decarli (the recruiting officer) is a good bass singer, acting with much soldierly bluffness and a discreet amount of military gallantry towards the attractive Gretchen. Herr Anton Erl (the student) has an agreeable tenor voice, and sings with earnestness and careful method. The music throughout was in the best taste, and beautifully orchestrated. The accompaniments were admirably played, with perfect attention to pianos, fortes, crescendos, &c., and the entre-acte (a lovely morsel) before the third act was exquisitely given—chiefly for stringed instruments—with a finish and delicacy worthy of quartett-playing.

The scenery, as is usual in this theatre, is an artistic study. The opening of this piece, for instance, representing the village at dawn of day, with the sky suffused by the roseate hue which precedes the rising of the sun, and gradually assuming the golden glory of morning, was a perfect piece of representation.

In the German version of Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew" (announced as "Die Widerspenstige," which unsuggestive title caused me innocently to inquire who was its author), the scenery was admirably true to the locality—"learned Padua." The colouring of the picturesque houses, the clever perspective of the streets, the perfect Italian air given throughout, was worthy of all praise. And again, when Schiller's noble drama of "Wilhelm Tell" was given, the other night, the effects of Alpine scenery were wonderfully rendered. A subdued tinkle of cattle and sheep bells, and occasionally heard distant church-chimes, suggested to the ear Swiss sounds, while gathering clouds, light and feathery at first, denser and denser by degrees, passing across the mountain heights at the back of the stage, increased whistling of the wind, deeper and deeper thunder-rolls, with more and more constant flashes of lightning, gave precisely the impression of storm approaching while the opening scene progressed. In another act, an evening rainbow; the last sunset-glow upon the distant snow-peaks; the gradual setting-in of darkness around the gorge where the insurrectionists meet to consult, the rocks revealed only by partial gleams from the men's torches and a central watchfire; the long, animated, and eager discussion of the Switzer's wrongs; then the slow stealing-on of the dawn, the rosy touch upon the loftier peaks in succession; all imparted a marvellous sense of truth to the length of passing time through a whole night of anxiously formed resolve. Theatre-going in Dresden is an elysium of artistic enjoyment to those who, like myself, take delight in good acting, sensible singing, bewitching scenery, and judicious by-play, combined with early hours and unfatiguing resort. The performances, for the most part, commence at seven, and are over before ten. The theatre itself is deliciously airy, spacious, and lofty; the accesses and egresses ample and convenient; the light beautifully arranged, leaving the audience in that semi-darkness which so completely relieves the eyes, while displaying the stage in advantageous contrast; and allowing one to conclude the evening with the most satisfactory sense of comfort and untired nerves.

There is other than operatic music constantly going on here—concerts at the Public Gardens, on the Brühl Terrace, and elsewhere; while on alternate days, early in the afternoon, a military band plays close by the King's Palace, with enchanting brilliancy, precision, and rich effect. The other day I heard one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," admirably arranged for wind instruments, breathed out by this band in a style of exquisite expression, with light and shade of tone that was perfectly entrancing; and on a previous occasion they gave a chorus from Wagner's "Rienzi" and one of Brahms's "Ungarische Tänze" with the utmost spirit and vivacity. Subsequently I have heard them play Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte" with a rapidity and clearness quite marvellous in wind instruments; and a Hymn for voices (arranged by the Music Director for this admirable brass band), composed by C. von Behr, with bewitching softness and purity of tone. It is a lovely composition, worthy of the very best composers, and was played with consistent excellence.

On the 6th, Adolphe Adam's pretty Operetta of "Le Postillon de Lonjumeau" was given, with Schuch-Proska as prima donna, and Anton Erl as tenor, both singing particularly well. On the following night we had "Preciosa," with Weber's bright Overture and incidental music, to which was added some characteristic dance music by Herr Wolf. The piece is pretty, and affords scope for rich and varied costumes in the Spanish nobles and wandering gipsies who form its dramatis personæ. The scenery was, as usual at this theatre, perfect; romantic forest and woodland glades, castle grounds and parterres; with effects of moonlight rippling on the sylvan brooks, or shedding its beams on the "loosening silver" of a fountain of real water plashing amid illuminated terraces and gala festivities.

The promised performance of Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil" took place on the 8th, and was a success with the assembled audience. Herr Riese, the tenor, is a great favourite here, but to my taste he is vulgar in style and very pretentious. He has a horrible way of shouting out particular notes in his voice with an offensive stress utterly distasteful and insufferable. He has not an idea of "phrasing," but sings with a grand disdain of care in the mode of breath-taking, heaving deep gasps whenever it suits him, preparatory to a loud, held-on note. The Bertrand, Herr Decarli, was evidently still suffering from indisposition; and though he sang with much painstaking, he was so hoarse towards the conclusion of the Opera that it was with difficulty he could sing at all. He was admirably "got up" for the part, and looked very picturesquely diabolic. The Princess (Frau Sembrich) was devoid of sentiment, though she executed her passages with creditable precision; while the Alice (Frau Otto Alvsleben) possessed a clear strong voice without sweetness or charm. The orchestra accompanied the vocal music with its wonted care and delicacy, leaving the singers to be heard with due effect. As to the scenery and stage-groupings they were a true pictorial treat; and the ruined convent and churchyard at midnight, with the moon's rays falling upon the range of cloister pillars, each truly varied in design according to cloistral architecture, and upon the Gothic remains towering into the sky, formed a perfect study in scenic art.

As I had never before heard Wagner's "Tannhäuser," I rejoiced in the opportunity afforded me by its performance here on the 10th. It was splendidly got up, and the singers executed their difficult parts with great credit, while the orchestra was equally meritorious. As for the chorus-singers, it was perfectly amazing to hear the correctness with which they sang passages so unusual in interval and musical flow. The points in the Opera most to my taste were the exquisitely poetic effect of the peaceful shepherd's piping and song, with the chorus of passing pilgrims, and the calmer air of the tenor-hero, just after he has returned to earth's surface from the allurements of the Venusberg, the three—shepherd, chorus, and Tannhäuser's air—blending together. Then the fine part-music of the septett for men's voices, where Tannhäuser's knightly friends welcome his return among them again, is admirable, and was admirably sung. Then Wolfram's address to the evening star, and the well-conceived yearning effect of the accompaniments by stringed instruments to Tannhäuser's last song, recounting to his faithful friend his misery and defeated purpose in Rome, particularly pleased me.

The elaboration and originality of this music throughout is certainly most striking, and keeps the attention perpetually on the stretch.

On the evening of the 13th there was some incidental music, composed by J. B. André, given with the German version of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night, or What you will," its second title being adopted as "Was ihr wollt." The original five-act play was condensed into a three-act piece, and admirably put upon the stage. The Viola was charmingly impersonated by Fräulein Elmenreich; who is a delightful actress. She has lovely expressive eyes, an enchanting smile, a graceful figure with most graceful action and mien, and—to crown all—has an exquisite speaking-voice, tender, emotional, and capable of varied intonation and inflection. My only regret was the loss of one of my chief favourites among Shakespeare's clown-jesters,—dear cheerful-hearted Feste; this character being eliminated from "Was ihr wollt," and incorporated in that of Fabian; but the whole adaptation was so judiciously done and so satisfactorily enacted—from the very first personages down to the most subordinate ones—that I enjoyed the performance completely.

Fortunately for me, Weber's "Freischütz" was performed here during my stay; because it is not only, to my thinking, one of the most charming operas ever written, but it is associated with a very bright period of my life. When I was a girl, more than half a century ago, the "Freischütz" was first performed in England at Covent Garden Theatre; and I remember the enthusiasm it excited in the musical circles of the day, and in the public generally. Its novel effects of instrumentation, its bold discords in the incantation scene, its grace and freshness of vocal passages at once aroused the liveliest interest; and it became "the rage." Every evening, the Overture was encored—and nothing was talked of but Weber and "Der Freischütz." Its London success brought its composer the order for his next Opera, and he was engaged to write his "Oberon" for Covent Garden Theatre, where it was brought out under his own conductorship, an event which I also witnessed.

The late performance of "Der Freischütz" here was super-excellent as regards orchestra, choruses, and careful level singing in all the characters; but the chief vocalists, to my taste, left much to be desired. The Agathe knew nothing of the art of phrasing or expression; the Max was poor; and the Caspar utterly lacked spirit in the Drinking-Song and the Triumph-Song of the first act.

I was struck, too, by the difference between the tempi taken in several of the movements here and with us; for instance, the opening of the Overture was, the other night, almost slower than largo; the Laughing-Chorus lagged; and the Drinking-Song was taken so slowly as to be heavy in the extreme, while the agitato second part of the moonlight aria lost all character by the tame rate at which it was executed. In all these pieces the slower tempo taken here was, I think, disadvantageous as compared with the one usually taken in England. It is to be supposed that Germany should know by tradition the exact tempo in which Weber wished his pieces to be performed; still, I prefer the one in which they are traditionally taken with us. On the whole, however, I was deeply grateful to have heard "Der Freischütz" again, and given in such generally satisfactory style as here in Dresden. Moreover, it was delightful to see the perfect "get-up" of the Incantation Scene in old Covent Garden times quite equalled by the modern supreme scenic arrangements of the Hoftheater here, and even to behold my well-remembered stage-owl of fifty-five years ago, with undimmed glaring eyes and still flapping wings. MARY COWDEN CLARKE.

P.S.—Since the above was written, Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's music, has been given at the Hoftheater in exquisitely satisfactory style. The fine Overture and imaginatively conceived incidental music were played to absolute perfection by the orchestra; the elaborate and beautiful "inner parts" of the compositions, and their general light and shade, with grand swellings-out of rich tone or delicate murmurs of undertone, were all rendered in a manner to make me behold Mendelssohn's own face again as it used to look when I have seen it irradiated by pleasure at skilful performance of a great composition. I felt too as if Shakespeare himself would have smiled approval upon the charming way in which his "Midsummer Night's Dream" was arranged for adaptation to modern scenic appointments. For instance, during the second act a "set scene" was maintained throughout; but so ingenious were its stage devices (the foreground of forest-trees, diverging paths, and bushy thickets in dim moonlight, with Athens in the distance, the Acropolis, Parthenon, and colossal figure of Minerva, all bathed in the full effulgence of the moonbeans), that it served completely to give the effect of the various changes of spot indicated by the original text as those wherein, successively, Puck and the First Fairy meet; the entrance of Oberon and Titania, with their respective trains of attendant elves; the misunderstandings of the two pairs of human lovers; the rehearsal of the "rude mechanicals"; the transformation of Bottom (the Weaver) and his enamourment of the Fairy Queen; and, lastly, the dawning of the day, with the approach of the royal hunting-party arousing the sleeping couples, and Theseus's bidding them repair to the nuptial temple. This final scene also exhibited the taste and care which mark all the scenic arrangements of the Dresden Hoftheater; for the vast roof and columns of the temple, which occupied the front and centre of the stage, had a background of mere blue sky, thereby giving the effect of a building on an eminence.

A word of special praise must be given to Herr Hagen, who played Flute (the Bellows-mender) and impersonated Thisbe in the Interlude; he was admirably got up in a Greek female costume, and acted with delightfully playful humour. But, indeed, all the dramatis personæ were admirably represented: and the whole performance was worthy of Shakespeare's poetical drama and Mendelssohn's poetical music.—M. C. C.

CARL ENGEL'S CLAVICHORDS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The remarkable "gebundene Klavier," the No. 4 Clavichord, of Mr. Engel, now to be seen at Messrs. Broadwood's, described by him in your last month's number (p. 413), presents two fresh aspects for consideration to the musicologist. The one leads back by the peculiarity of scale to an early accordance, perhaps anterior, unless entirely due to mechanical conditions, to the general acceptance of our major mode. It is this: supposing we start from C (although F has equal rights), the scale proceeds by three fifths up, G, D, and A, and as many down, F, B♭, and E♭, thus by seven open notes making a diatonic series, with minor instead of major seventh—a scale of which there is a survival in the Highland bagpipes. The second stopping produced by the half-tone tangents is measured off by about an eighteenth of the vibrating length of string, a mean of fluctuating measures from rather more than a sixteenth to a twentieth. This is practically the fretting of a lute or viol finger-board, and leans to an equal rather than a larger or smaller semitone.

The other aspect is that, by the adoption of "bundfrei" clavichords, whereby each note had its own tangent, temperament became possible; and it may be that J. S. Bach intended to mark the great importance of this invention allowing a complete circle of twelve fifths, as much as that he had adopted equal temperament, when, in 1722, he called his first collection of twenty four preludes and fugues "Das Wohltemperirte Klavier." Of course, the organ and harpsichord were capable of temperament at any time, but the clavichord, for many reasons, and of these not the least that it was expressive, was the special instrument for study.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Kensington, August 6, 1879. A. J. HIPKINS.

FOURTHS TO OLD CHANTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the Rev. H. Parr's letter upon the above subject contained in the June number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, he states (Canon Havergal being his authority) that the chord 6-4-3 is "hardly a century old"—of course Mr. Parr means the 6-4-3 arising from the dominant seventh, for any musician knows that instances of the 6-4-3 from the diminished seventh are often met with in the works of Handel and even Purcell; and supposing that the second inversion of the dominant seventh is referred to, I should be glad to be permitted to say that, although I believe Handel never used the chord in question, I have before me several instances of its employment more than a century ago. I refer to "Der General-Bass" by Johann David Heinichen, first edition, 1711; second edition (from which I quote), 1728; pages 153, 166, 191, and 198, where are numerous examples of the 6-4-3.—I am, Sir, yours obediently, Sidmouth, August 12, 1879. H. A. HARDING, B. Mus.

P.S.—May I add that Mr. Heineken, of this town (Sidmouth), has lately reprinted, for gratis distribution amongst those who are really interested in the matter, an extract from the venerable volume above referred to, which contains in bar 28 a perfect 6-4-3 second inversion of dominant seventh?

G. C.—No English version of Spontini's "La Vestale" has been published. It was performed in London in Italian.

A. F. F.—The notation for the trumpet being always that of the C trumpet, in whatever pitch the instrument may stand, the intervals of the D trumpet noticed by you as G and G sharp, are of course in the notation F and F sharp, thus:—

The trumpeters in Handel's time were able to produce tolerably correctly the two notes in question from the intermediate one, which is a natural sound on the primitive trumpet. Altenburg, in his "Guide to the Heroic Musical Art of the Trumpeter and Kettle-Drummer," Halle, 1795, explains how this was done. The trumpeters were not unfrequently very accomplished players; and they attained to all the greater perfection by dividing their labour, some practising more especially the lower octaves, and others the so-called Clarino, which extended upwards from C to E, thus:— and even higher. On the long trumpet in use in Handel's time these sounds were obtainable with greater ease than on the present trumpet of the same simple construction. The rise of the pitch has altered the former conditions.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BATH.—The arrangements for the Choral Festival to be given in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund in this city are now completed. There will be a Choral Service on the morning of the 30th inst. in the Abbey Church, when the sermon will be preached by the Bishop of Bath and Wells. In the evening a Concert of Glees, Madrigals, &c., will be given in the Assembly Rooms. A second Choral Service will be held on the following day, on which occasion the Rev. Henry White, of the Chapel Royal, Savoy, will preach the sermon; in the afternoon another Concert will be given, so that many persons who would be unable to attend in the evening will have the opportunity of being present. We understand that many influential gentlemen and noblemen have already given their names as patrons and subscribers to the Festival, and there is every prospect of a successful meeting. Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Marian McKenzie, and other artists have consented to take part in the Concerts.

DROMORE, Co. TYRONE.—The members of the Choral Class gave their Annual Concert, on July 30, to a crowded audience. The concerted pieces included "The blue bells," Neithardt; "Sir Knight," Macirone; "Let Erin remember," Moore; and "The gipsies' tent," Cooke. Miss Marshall gave an excellent rendering of Louis Diehl's song, "My sailor love," and Mr. Arnold's song, "The desert," (Emanuel) was encored. Mr. Arnold, of Enniskillen, conducted.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon, the 17th ult., the Fourth Annual Service of Praise was held in Salem Chapel, Hunslet Lane. The choir was augmented on this occasion to sixty voices, and supported by a small but efficient band. Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and Schubert's Song of Miriam were well rendered, the solos being effectively sung by Miss Tetley, Miss Winkworth, Miss Willans, and Mr. Thompson. A selection from Dr. J. V. Roberts's Cantata Jonah, viz., tenor solo, "The Lord is righteous," by Mr. Thompson; quartett, "The Lord taketh pleasure," by the Misses Tetley, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Rhodes; and bass solo, "Whither shall I go," by Mr. D. Billington, were marked features in the programme. Miss Winkworth sang "Hath not God," from Dr. Macfarren's Joseph, very charmingly. Mr. Burniston presided at the organ, and Mr. Toothill conducted.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—In addition to, and in conjunction with, the now established amateur choir of ladies' voices, it is intended to form a Society of mixed voices for the practice of choral works of interest never yet heard in Newcastle. Mr. T. Albion Alderson, who has successfully trained the first-mentioned Society, will also have the conduct of the new one; and the following works have been selected for the ensuing session: Bach's God's Time is the best, Goetz's By the Waters of Babylon, and Schumann's Pilgrimage of the Rose.

OSSETT.—The seventh Annual Festival of the Dewsbury District Choral Union was held in Trinity Church, on Saturday, the 23rd ult., the twelve choirs of the Union numbering about 300 voices. The Anthem was "The Glory of the Lord" (Sir J. Goss), and Sullivan's Te Deum in D was sung after the service. The organ was supplemented by a small string band of fifteen performers, free accompaniments for the whole service (Psalm Chants included) having been written by the Rev. J. A. Seaton, Honorary Choirmaster of the Union. Between the rehearsal in the afternoon and the service in the evening, the choir had tea in the National School-room, after which the Rev. Canon Addison, vicar of Ossett, in the name of the clergy and choirs of the Union, presented the Rev. J. A. Seaton with Dyce's edition of Shakespeare's works in nine volumes, handsomely bound in red morocco, and Blunt's "Dictionary of Theology," as a token of regard for his services as choirmaster to the Union since its formation, and on the occasion of his marriage. The Rev. R. F. Grenside, Precentor to the Union, intoned the service, and the Rev. J. A. Seaton conducted.

SYDNEY, N. S. WALES.—The musical faculty are busily preparing for our approaching International Exhibition. The Commissioners have appointed Signor Giorza as general musical director, and composer of the opening ceremonial music: his election without competition has excited much comment and dissatisfaction amongst many of the local professors, a small paper warfare pro and con. being the result, but without affecting the proposed arrangements. As the most talented man would necessarily have been excluded from any competition in order to act as judge, and a very short time has been left to procure any original music at all, perhaps the Commissioners have exercised a wise discretion in their choice. A feature in the Exhibition music is to be the production of six Oratorios, one performance taking place monthly; to ensure a creditable rendition the organists and choirmasters have combined together, under the title of the "Sacred Choral Association," and by their united influence have succeeded in forming a chorus of upwards of 600 selected voices. The works chosen for performance, with their Conductors, are as follows: Creation, Mr. C. S. Packer; Israel in Egypt, Mr. W. Stanley; Elijah, Mr. H. R. McLean; Messiah, Mr. W. Stanley; St. Peter, Mr Montague Younger; and an original Oratorio, The Crown of Thorns, conducted by the composer, Mr. C. S. Packer, an esteemed and one of our most talented local professors. The two last will be "first performances" in the Australian Colonies, and their production is looked for with much interest. The Association is under the control of a committee of three organists and three choirmasters, Mr. W. H. Rowsell acting as honorary secretary.——The Sydney Musical Union has recently performed with great success Costa's Eli and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Night, and have in hand Gade's Erl-King. This Society is under the skilful guidance of Herr J. Kretschmann, the talented Conductor of the Head Quarters' Band and the Civil Service Musical Society. Lieutenant G. D. Callen, the Conductor of the two last for many years, died suddenly last month, much regretted by a very large circle of friends: the choral services at the Anglican Cathedral on the Sunday following the announcement of his death were arranged as a mark of respect to his memory, consisting of a beautiful manuscript Service in E flat, composed by the deceased gentleman, and closing with the Dead March, very finely played by the Organist, Mr. M. Younger.

TENBY.—Mr. Thomas Armstrong gave a highly successful Concert at the Royal Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday evening, July 29, in aid of the St. Mary's Church choir fund. The solo vocalists were Miss Fannie Lymn, Mr. James Buckley, and Mr. R. C. Jenkins, R.A.M., and the concerted music was sung by members of St. Mary's church choir. Sir George Fetherston contributed a solo on the American organ, and pianoforte duets were played by Miss Bradstreet and Mr. Armstrong. Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique was well rendered by Mr. Armstrong, who also accompanied the vocalists with much skill and judgment.

WORCESTER.—The Festival in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund is now definitely fixed for October 2. The members of the various Choirs will proceed from Bath, on the conclusion of the Festival there, and an afternoon service will be held in the Cathedral, when a sermon will be preached by the Rev. Henry White; in the evening a concert of Glees, Madrigals, &c., in which Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Marian McKenzie, and other artists will take part, will be given in the Music Hall. An influential list of patrons is already being formed, and it is hoped that the Festival will result beneficially to the Society.

YORK.—On the evening of the 15th ult. a most enjoyable Concert was given in the large hall of the Yorkshire Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition, being the second which has taken place since its opening. The vocalists engaged were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Blagbro', and Mr. Thornton Wood, with a chorus consisting of 100 voices of the York Musical Society, conducted by Mr. R. S. Burton. Madame Enriquez created a very favourable impression by her rendering of Smart's song "The Lady of the Lea," Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming," and Rocket's new song, "Won by a rose," which was encored. Miss Tomlinson, Mr. Blagbro' and Mr. Wood were also highly successful, and received much applause. The chorus fully maintained the reputation of the Society; and to Mr. Burton praise must be awarded for his exertions to make the concert so successful.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. Fouracre to Edith Grove Congregational Church, West Brompton.—Mr. Henry A. Gaster to S. James's Church, Bermondsey.

MOZART'S REQUIEM.
Now ready.
THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM
Carefully compiled from the best and most authentic Sources,
BY WM. POLE, F.R.S., MUS. DOC.
PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal

PART XLIII., July, 1879. 20 Pages. To Subscribers, 2s. 6d.

"This number will be for ever cherished by the lovers of sterling, original composition for the king of instruments, from the interesting fact that it contains a noble piece—the last work of Henry Smart—whose recent death every organist acquainted with his productions so deeply deplores. It is a Postlude in E Flat, written in a clear form and masterly style—very much after the manner of a first movement of a symphony or sonata. Rich in ideas, and thoroughly ecclesiastical in form and in spirit, it commends itself to the organist of mature ability, who, as he plays or reads it, will find the clever treatment of a chorale, the counterpoint and harmony, as well as the skilful interweaving of melodious links, which will assuredly increase his respect for the genius of Henry Smart, than whom no greater or more successful composer of organ music has ever rejoiced in the name of an Englishman. The number also contains a contribution by the editor, an Introduction and Allegro of a very spirited character, and worthy of the company of Henry Smart. The other pieces are written in a high style, and altogether the production is an excellent one."—Yorkshire Post.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

IN issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE.

"A. FETIS,

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany.)"

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

Dr. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

"A supreme and perfect harmony of notes."

E. & W. SNELL'S IMPROVED HARMONIUMS.

Works, King Street North, Camden Town, London, N.W.

From the Lord Bishop of Colombo, Matara, Ceylon, May, 1879.

"Gentlemen,—The Harmonium sent out by you has arrived in good order, and gives satisfaction.—Yours, &c.,

"Messrs. Snell and Co." "R. S. Colombo.

From Chas. H. Wrigley, Esq., Organist of Brookfield Church, Manchester, Oak Bank, Fairfield, August 27, 1879.

"Gentlemen,—I am happy to say that the splendid Harmonium you have sent me gives entire satisfaction. The tone of the stops on upper manual is exceedingly delicate and beautiful, more like the tone of the Organ Dulciana and Suabe Flute than reeds. The tone of the stops on the lower manual is rich and full, whilst I must add that the Flute and the Cor-anglais is particularly diapason-like in quality.

"The touch is very pleasant, and the speech rapid and prompt. I must compliment you upon the new and beautiful design of the case, which makes the instrument look something like the Pianoforte, and is a decided improvement upon the box-like shape of the old Harmonium.

"Altogether it is a grand instrument of two manuals and 22 stops, and combined with its moderate price and sound workmanship reflects great credit upon your firm.—Yours very truly,

"Messrs. E. & W. Snell." "Chas. H. Wrigley.

FRANZ LISZT'S WRITINGS ON MUSIC

By Ludwig Nohl.

While Richard Wagner—according to the remark of Heinrich Laube, who in 1843 published the composer's well-known autobiographical sketch in the Zeitung für die elegante Welt—had become an author through the stress of his Parisian experiences as operatic composer, the motive power which prompted Liszt in taking up the literary pen proceeded from a source quite different, viz., from an intense desire to labour for the interests of his art irrespective of all party considerations.

"Error and misunderstanding stood in the way of the desired success," writes Wagner, in reference to the production of "Tannhäuser" at Weimar through Liszt's exertions in the year 1849. "What was to be done in order to supply the deficiency, and to facilitate in every way the public appreciation? Liszt promptly discerned it, and acted accordingly. He presented to the public his own estimation and conception of the work in a manner unparalleled alike for convincing eloquence and deep-going effect." It is the article in the Journal des Débats of 1849 which is here referred to, and which was republished in 1851 at Leipzig, in conjunction with a second, under the title of "Lohengrin et Tannhäuser de Richard Wagner." Long before that period, however, the extraordinary vivacity of his artistic nature had caused Liszt to have recourse to his pen. Letters by the travelling musician were published in the Gazette Musicale, some of them dating as far back as the year 1838, and scarcely a composer of importance could be named—Berlioz, Halévy, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Schubert, Schumann, Moscheles, amongst the rest—who has escaped his critical observation. Add to these his more ambitious writings—"De la Fondation-Goethe à Weimar," "Frédéric Chopin," "Die Zigeuner und ihre Musik in Ungarn," as well as the numerous articles in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and the more elaborate essays on "Der fliegende Holländer" (1854) and "Robert Franz" (1855)—and it will be seen that Liszt's literary activity comprises, like Wagner's, a stately array of volumes yielding in artistic importance to none which have been published concerning musical art.

And what is the position occupied by the musical author in the present day? When, during the last century, the poet Schubart penned his æsthetical observations on music, he had only become acquainted with the first noble utterances of that musical language which the invention of Opera had introduced into our art. But the Italian idiom upon which the new art-work was based already enjoyed the highest degree of development, while the French language of Gluck's operas had materially heightened the speaking power of melody. Soon also the entire instrumental music assumed this character of personal speech, representing, like all true lyrical art, as it were, the personified universe. Meanwhile a great literary epoch was rapidly developing the beauties of the German language which, in its fusion with music, could not fail to unfold fresh beauties also in that art. Liszt, writing from Vienna in the year 1838, relates how he had heard there with delight, and frequently moved unto tears, songs by Franz Schubert, adding significantly: "Schubert is the most poetical of all musicians that have ever lived; the German language admirably touches the heart, and by a German only the childlike purity, the melancholy depth of feeling which are infused into Schubert's compositions, can be to the fullest extent appreciated." It was the language of Goethe and Schiller which had penetrated into music, invigorating and refreshing like heavenly dew, and repaying now a hundredfold the aid which, particularly in the choral, it had previously obtained from musical art. The almost sentimental reverence is well known with which Gluck regarded Klopstock's "Odes," and more especially his "Hermannsschlacht." Mozart had composed "The Violet," and the novel charm of its language extended its influence even upon the "Zauberflöte," so that the sorry verses of Schikaneder, or rather of Giesecke, were deprived of their injurious influence. Beethoven, too, was in his earlier period an enthusiastic admirer of Klopstock, whose ideal flight of thought and grand poetic intentions no doubt powerfully attracted him. But this attraction vanished upon his becoming acquainted with Goethe. "He has killed Klopstock in my estimation," was his expression. And again, Goethe's friend, Bettina Brentano, heard the composer exclaim: "Goethe's poems maintain, not by their poetic meaning alone, but also by their rhythm, a powerful influence over me. I become musically disposed and stimulated by this language, which, as if aided by spirits, is built up into a higher ideal order containing in itself already the secret of harmony." As with the perfection of the language music had itself acquired the power of personal speech, so had the art, in its turn, materially increased the capabilities of the words to express musical ideas. Henceforth, indeed, the masters in the art alone may be considered also its true literary exponents; the domain of theory and historical research still pertains to the musical savant, but he is fain to relinquish to the artist the task of realising also in words the specifically artistic and poetic significance of the works of genius, since it is almost entirely owing to the creative efforts of the tone-poets themselves that the faculty has been developed of expressing in material language the ideas underlying the most immaterial of all arts.

To support the assertion just made we will, in the first instance, quote the example of Carl Maria von Weber, whose famous though ill-advised critique of the "Eroica" (published in the Stuttgart Morgenblatt of 1809) exhibits, spite of all its misconceptions, far more appreciation of Beethoven's genius and of musical art generally than the entire body of musical littérateurs of the period could have mustered; and the reader need not be told how ably the composer of "Freischütz" used his critical pen in after years. And here we may also mention Bettina Brentano's "Seelenvolle Phantasien über Musik," a series of æsthetic observations which have found a place in Goethe's "Correspondence with a Child," and the stimulating influence of which may be traced among literary musicians of the third decade of the present century. About the year 1812 E. T. A. Hoffmann's reviews of Beethoven's Symphonies appeared (in the music journal edited by Rochlitz), containing observations which in these latter days would have inevitably stamped their author as a confessed "Wagnerian." Marvellous as was the use made of the language by Hoffmann in following the ideal efforts of the composer's genius, he went farther still in his "Kreisleriana," where abstract linguistic expressions are converted into a means of revealing the mysteries of our art, of its very elements and harmonic relations. Whatever other effects this literary innovation may have produced, it could not fail to expand the hitherto recognised limits of the language, to enrich its vocabulary, to give it, in fact, a new character. But in order to achieve such results it was essential that their author should combine in himself the qualities of musician and imaginative writer, and this Hoffmann did in an unusual degree. Still, in his writings on musical subjects the leading characteristics are brilliancy rather than glowing warmth, sentimental and even fantastic colouring, rather than positive poetic force and high-flown fancy, such as, in a measure, the truly poetic nature of Bettina had already manifested, and to whose glowing effusions even Goethe owed a glimpse into the mighty power of music. But not a poetic nature merely, a true-born poet was needed to adequately represent in words the manifestations of musical genius. It was Robert Schumann who, powerfully impressed and stimulated by the writings of Jean Paul—a poet endowed with an intuitive musical insight of a high order—first began to draw together (in his journal the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik) a select body of reflecting musicians capable of giving verbal utterance to their thoughts upon the art. The benefit accruing to music from the initiative step thus taken by Schumann will be at once apparent if we compare its immediate literary results with the theoretical writings of a T. A. Wendt, in which even Beethoven had discerned "thoughts full of wisdom," or with a Thibaut's "Reinheit der Tonkunst," albeit a work bearing the impress of a mind fully impregnated with the beautiful in music, and remaining to this day a useful compendium to the art-student. About the same period some of Mozart's observations on music, now fully revealed by the publication of his letters, became known; while Beethoven's exalted estimation of his own art may be gathered from the above letters of Bettina Brentano to Goethe, which likewise appeared in print about this time (1835). France, too, contributed thoughts replete with artistic earnestness in the literary writings of Hector Berlioz, showing that in this respect also music has no idiomatic limit; nay, it would seem almost as if its very spirit and character were innate in all modern idioms, forming their real life-spring and distinguishing them from the languages of ancient times.

Liszt also—and this leads us to our more immediate subject—Liszt also wrote in French, and in French only, and yet it may be said that he has likewise enriched and expanded the German language. For he wrote in the spirit of the newly emancipated language of the country which may justly claim modern music to be the production of its own genius. In the articles published in the Gazette Musicale of 1838 Liszt introduces himself to his readers in these words: "Some fifteen years ago my father quitted his peaceful roof to wander into the world with me. He settled down in France, where he thought would be found the most suitable sphere for the development and maturing of my genius—as, in his silly parental pride, he would call my musical talents. Thus have I early in life forgotten my original home, and have learnt to look upon France as my fatherland." The first tribute he paid to his adopted country was by mastering its language, which, it may confidently be asserted, no born Frenchman has ever handled with greater freedom, originality, or even creative power; while the neologisms and Germanisms with which he has sometimes been taxed can only have been discovered by the enviers of his unique style. This latter is distinguished by a boldness, pithiness, refinement, and richness of expression which are truly surprising and absolutely enchanting. Even through the mask and mockery of existing translations of these writings, the gleaming eyes of the giant look upon us, and, as one of his translators justly remarks: "Just as unique, unapproached, and unapproachable as is his play, is also Liszt's style. Both are the peculiar property of his genius; in both we meet with the same genial nonchalance, which however, even when accompanying the highest flight of his enthusiasm, never offends against the laws of the beautiful." If fault were to be found at all, it could only be with a superabundance of thought and a luxuriant imagination which knows no limits to the variety and novelty of the images it creates. This, however, is only the natural result of the exuberant wealth inherent to the subject with which he deals; and if he, as well as German writers on music, have frequently been taunted by other nations with a certain haziness and mysteriousness of language, especially where Beethoven's compositions are concerned, the inference may not unreasonably be drawn that they have not yet approached as closely as ourselves to the full appreciation of this particular phase in the development of our art.

It would lead us too far were we to enlarge upon the different subjects of Liszt's literary writings. Suffice it to state that so completely has our artist imbibed the spirit of every modern language, that he was able to comprehend the universal spirit pervading them all, and to interpret with its aid, and from this elevated standpoint, the true meaning and import of music. In this sense, then, he has enlarged the sphere of human expression of thought; and a really worthy translation of his literary compositions would undoubtedly tend to assist in the progress of any language in which it may be accomplished. The weaker portions of these writings are, of course, the historical and theoretical, appertaining as they do to science and research rather than to art and the inspiration of genius. There are exceptions, however, also to this, as, for instance, in the above-mentioned essay on Robert Franz, where a definition is given of what is called the "Lied" which is indeed masterly, the essay throughout being moreover the result of calm contemplation rather than of fiery enthusiasm. How promptly and clearly, on the other hand, Liszt is able to indicate the manifestation of an entirely original idea, and how important, for this reason, his expositions are for the history of his art, may be gathered from the following passage taken from his article on "Lohengrin," and with which, as a fairly representative example of his general mode of treatment, we will conclude these remarks. Referring to the farewell strains with which the Knight of the "Holy Grail" dismisses his faithful swan, Liszt observes: "Music had hitherto been deficient in this type, which poets and painters have so frequently attempted to represent; it had never yet expressed that pure sentiment, that holy grief with which angels, and other beings superior to man, are seized when they are banished from heaven and consigned to this earthly abode of sorrow, in order to fulfil the beneficial objects of their mission. We are of opinion that music has no longer cause to envy the other arts in this respect; rather we are convinced that in not one of them has this feeling been realised in such high, nay heavenly, perfection."

"He must needs be a poet, consciously or not, willingly or not," says Goethe of Winkelmann's prose writings; and the words may be equally applied to Liszt. Winkelmann's descriptions of the masterpieces of plastic art have already outlived a century, and have enriched the language in which he wrote with new forms of expression. And in like manner will the æsthetic analysis of the psychological figures delineated in modern musical art impart greater depth and freedom to linguistic expression; and in this respect the writings of Franz Liszt, representing as they do the universal spirit of modern culture, will undoubtedly be accorded a prominent place in history.

By Fr. Niecks.

The second division of the work, the Gloria, is, in conformity with the underlying text, a many-numbered composition of varied contents. The full band (only the trombones are silent, and for a very good reason, as we shall see), together with the organ, intone in unisons and octaves the Gloria motivo— the strings and double-bassoon melodically periphrasing, and the violins, violas, and cellos at the same time rhythmically resolving it, only the third and fourth horns insisting on the tonic. With the fifth bar the voices begin to come in successively, the strings keeping up a vivacious quaver figure (No. 4, b), divided into semiquavers by all except the double-basses.

All this singing, ringing, and pulsating, so full of joyous excitement and religious elevation, tend to express that one thought which animates them all, "Gloria in excelsis Deo." How the trumpet clangs! Not a "snarling trumpet" this, that "chides" like those of which the poet tells us, but a "silver" one whose tones ascend jubilantly aloft. Again and again the Gloria motivo, of which every feature expresses exultation (the melodic direction, the rhythmical movements), is taken up with ever-growing fervour, now by this and now by that instrument or choral part, till at last all individual differences are dissolved and fused into one unanimous outburst of "in excelsis Deo"—the voices and some of the winds in octaves and unisons, the strings and double-bassoon in the manner above specified, the first flute, trumpets, third and fourth horns, and drums rejoicing in the sonorousness of the fundamentals, tonic and dominant. But on a sudden all is hushed. The basses of the chorus, accompanied by the strings playing pizzicato, and two horns sustaining the same note in octaves, utter softly on the low "A" the words "et in terra pax." After this, at the fourth bar, the other voices, together with the violins and violas, join—"pax hominibus, bonae voluntatis"—the bass voices and the horns still sustain the "A," above which are heard only the fundamental note and the fifth of the chord of D major, whilst below it the cellos and double-basses draw out the third (F sharp) with a marvellous effect:—

What a peaceful calm comes over us here. All worldly struggles, anxieties, and enmities are left far, far behind. Anon the Gloria motivo is heard again, given out softly by the trumpets, horns, and drums, soon joined by the strings, then the winds burst forth in a body (as yet no trombones), and the chorus follows immediately, and shouts "Laudamus te, benedicimus te." Again there is a sudden hush, during which the words "Adoramus te" are pronounced, awe-inspired and awe-inspiring; the chanting voices of the chorus are supported by the strings alone and subdued to a pianissimo, the harmony consists of tonic, dominant, and octave only. [The Adoramus of this mass should be compared with that of the one in C major, where the unexpected appearance of B flat major after C produces a fine effect.] Hereupon the vocal and instrumental basses strike up a bold and joyful strain, "Glorificamus te"— the other voices and instruments following imitatively.

This song of praise is interrupted for a moment by the softly breathed "Adoramus te," then continued, and finally leads to a Meno Allegro (forty-three bars—the preceding Allegro vivace contains 130 bars), in B flat major, the setting of the "Gratias agimus." After an introduction apportioned to the clarionets, bassoons, horns, violas, cellos, and double-basses, the tenor (solo) begins a lovely, heartfelt cantilena—which is taken up at the fifth bar by the alto, four bars later by the treble, next by the bass, and lastly by the chorus, first by the trebles and altos, then by the tenors and basses.

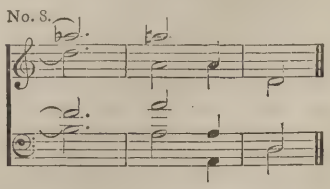
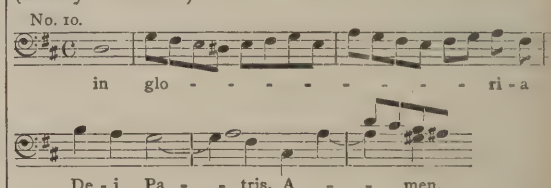
It is impossible to "give thanks" in a more acceptable manner. He who listens to this unmoved can have neither music nor piety in him; and we may say, with Shakespeare, let no such man be trusted—he is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils. The tempo primo (fifty-six bars) brings back the Gloria motivo (E flat major, forte), which, however, is confined to the band, while to the chorus new motivi are assigned, consonant with the words, "Domine Deus, Rex cælestis, Deus pater" expressive of power and majesty. Then comes on the word "omnipotens," what Lenz calls the "tonal thunderbolt." On the first syllable all the voices and instruments (the trombones being no longer idle) burst out with the crashing chord of the dominant seventh. Beethoven marked the passage explicitly fff; and in the organ part, "Pleno organo con Pedale." After the chord has been sustained for three bars (the trebles holding the high "A" flat), the next three syllables are hurled forth with a sudden turn to D major in a most extraordinary manner:—



Nobody will say that the composer spared his means in the endeavour to impress us with God's omnipotence. Nor will anybody maintain that the result is not grand. And now notice, in connection with the "Domine fili unigenite," how Beethoven always grows tender when he speaks of the Saviour. The

Gloria motivo reappears (this time in F major and fortissimo), the voices exclaim, "Domine Deus, Agnus Dei, Filius Patris," the first and last phrase with the expression of majesty and power; the second ("Lamb of God") with more tenderness. In the Mass in C Beethoven gives a tender expression to the whole passage. We now come to another movement, a Larghetto, $\frac{3}{4}$, in F major (sixty-two bars), of indescribable beauty. The wood winds and horns begin, in the eighth and ninth bars the solo voices enter, pronouncing the "Qui tollis peccata mundi" with deep-felt accents, and, as it were, with a humble, devout, and trustful upward glance, the "Miserere nobis" wringing itself painfully from the oppressed breast. Then follows the urging entreaty "Suscipe deprecationem nostrum." Words cannot translate the language of the heart. I must, therefore, confine myself to saying that the genii of piety and beauty seem to have here closed a hallowed union, so that with their combined strength they might once more endeavour to effect what singly they failed in, the amelioration of men:—

When we think of Him as sitting on the right hand of His Father ("qui sedes ad dextram patris"), we feel the infinite distance between Him and us sinful, weak creatures. Hence the majesty and the sublime grandeur of Beethoven's rendering. [How differently Bach has conceived this passage! Cherubini, on the other hand, comes nearer Beethoven.] What can our next thought be but "miserere nobis"? The words, as heard in this place, impress one like the murmured prayers of a congregation, kneeling with their heads bent and faces hidden. Above these indistinct sounds other voices, those of priests, rise and give utterances in articulate language to the feelings of these trembling souls. Every note is instinct with meaning—the shuddering of the strings, the lamentations of the oboe and clarionets, &c. The simultaneous occurrence of the phrases "miserere nobis" and "qui sedes," &c., each with its characteristic expression, must not be passed by without being pointed out. The striking in of the chord of the fourth and sixth (C sharp, F sharp, A) after F major is likewise remarkable. This movement, which ends on the dominant of F sharp minor, expires with sighs, tending to but not attaining the tonic. A pianissimo roll of the kettle-drum, tuned in A, introduces an Allegro maestoso (fifty bars)—majestic not only in name but in truth. The trumpets, kettle-drum, and, after little more than a bar, also the horns proclaim the tonic; all the other instruments sweep along grandly in unisons and octaves. The tenors take up the words, "Quoniam tu solus sanctus" first, giving out the last word pianissimo. His holiness fills them with wonder and reverence; the thought once realised takes away the breath. Also the instrumentation is wonderful: the combination consists of the strings, two bassoons, and double-bassoon; the violins have assigned to them the small "g," the violas the small "e" and "g," the bassoons the small "c" and "e," the cellos the small "c," and the double-bassoon and the double-bass the great "C." This is undeniably an original and impressive idea. The vigorous harmonic progression, the return from C major to D major on the word "Dominus," the piling up of voice above voice, instrument above instrument, till on "altissimus" the twice-accented "a" has been reached by the trebles, and the thrice-accented "a" by the flute and violins, kept up for six bars and a crotchet, may be mentioned as salient points of this section of the Gloria, which concludes with the words "Cum sancto spiritu in gloria patris, Amen." Is an increase of power and grandeur possible after what we have heard now? Beethoven answers yes. Indeed he is only just going to begin the ascent that leads up to the overpowering climax of this unparalleled structure. The words "in gloria patris, Amen," receive next a fugal treatment which begins with an Allegro ma non troppo e ben marcato (ninety-nine bars):—



Voices and instruments—a multiplicity blended in a unity of sentiment, the glorification of the Deity—roll onwards in ceaseless succession. Fourteen times the subject appears in the different parts of the chorus supported by the orchestra and organ, the last four times forming a stretto; next the solo voices take it up with the wood winds, whilst first the choral basses and then the tenors sing out in long-drawn notes "Cum sancto spiritu." And thus the plot goes on thickening till we come to the culmination of this colossal fugue, that pedal-point of nineteen bars, where the organ, double-bassoon, bass trombone, and kettle-drum take hold of the dominant, rejoicing in their immovable strength, whilst all the rest sing, blow, and bow in harmonious confusion the fugal theme, in its original shape and in augmentation, intersecting and overtopping each other. Still the highest point is not yet reached. In a Poco più allegro (sixty-six bars), the "Amen," the "In gloria patris," the "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," and the "Cum sancto spiritu," each has its proper motivo. But how they are taken up, now by one instrument, solo voice, or part of the chorus, now by larger masses; how they are worked up together into one mighty surging, swelling, roaring sea of sound I shall not attempt to describe. And then, as if the wonder was not yet astounding enough, Beethoven once more introduces the Gloria motivo, presto ($\frac{3}{4}$, D major, forty-five bars), with eager imitations and striking modulations, concluding with a general, boundless exultation.

Before we proceed in the analysis let us take breath for a moment. On comparing the solemn Masses composed by Bach, Cherubini, and Beethoven, we find that Bach has set the words of the Gloria to eight distinct pieces; Beethoven, on the other hand, to one closely united composition; whilst Cherubini, taking a middle course, connects the parts more loosely, and comes twice to a close and begins again. Beethoven's plan is the boldest and most ambitious, Bach's undoubtedly the most prudent, and perhaps also the wisest. It must be admitted that the transitions in Beethoven's Gloria are sometimes abrupt. In reading the words of the underlying text we do not feel the abruptness, because we do not see the inherent meaning with the vividness with which Beethoven places it before us. In his music every phrase, and often even every word, becomes a picture. Now, it is impossible to attain both this distinctness of detail and perfect unity; you must either sacrifice one of the two or bring about a compromise between them. Beethoven would have nothing to do with compromises, nor would he sacrifice one excellence to another. He gave to the details the greatest possible distinctness, and at the same time strove with the gigantic power of his genius to remove the difficulties that obstructed the way to perfect unity. What he effected is truly stupendous; that he did not reach the ultimate stage, the summit of perfection, is owing to the nature of the art. Music cannot play with similes and negatives; it deals with essences, and is always positive. And where it is true to itself it does not touch lightly, but goes to the bottom of things. This distinguishes music from poetry, and determines, or ought to determine, its subjects and forms. But in one respect the two arts resemble each other: a musical work does not remain stationary before us like pictorial, sculptural, or architectural works, but moves past us like a poem. This is an important consideration that should always be kept in mind. The Mass is a mine rich in subjects for the musical composer. The portion of it which is set apart for musical treatment suggests almost as many programmes, waiting to be filled up by the musician, as it contains words. There is a great scope for the art and power of the composer in the picturing of these many and varied emotional states. Bach found in the short text material for twenty-four distinct pieces; on "Kyrie eleison" he has a comment of 126 bars, on "Christe eleison" of 85, on the second "Kyrie eleison of 59, on the "Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonae voluntatis" of 176, and so on. But there is one part of the text which, on account of its mainly speculative contents and its grammatical structure, is unsuitable for musical treatment, namely, the "Credo." Various ways have been tried to overcome the difficulty, but success can at best only be relative. Perhaps the problem can only be solved by the evasion of the difficulty (if that may be called a solution), by abstaining from the attempt to illustrate the words, and to give a merely formal setting to this portion of the Mass. This, however, is contrary to the art views and instincts of our time. Much may be learned from a comparison of the Credos of various composers, and of the various Credos of the same composer. Schubert, in his Mass in G, furnishes us with an example of a Credo with an ostinato figure running like a red thread through the whole (there is only one) movement. Mozart's usual proceeding is to work up an energetic, not to say lively, instrumental motivo or phrase with the vocal setting, continuing thus till he comes to the "Incarnatus est," to give a more lyrical expression to this passage, to the "Crucifixus," and perhaps to some others, then to take up again the opening motivo, and to treat the "Et vitam venturi" fugally. A very interesting Credo is found in Cherubini's Coronation Mass in A, where the dogmas are declared by one or the other part of the chorus and assented to by the whole chorus with the word "Credo." Bach, on the other hand, unmindful of sense and grammar, divides his Credo into eight separate movements. The first is a setting of "Credo in unum Deum;" another piece, in a different key and movement, brings the apposition of the object, or the second object, of the sentence illustrated in the preceding number—"Patrem omnipotentem," &c., and so on.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

It would be unpardonable not to notice, before finally dismissing the Paris letters, two or three addressed from the French capital to intimate friends, and not included in the published volumes of the master's correspondence. Especially should these receive attention since they are in Mendelssohn's most characteristic style, and full of the abandon which he thought it politic to restrain when writing anything likely to come under the eye of his father. In these confidential communications, Mendelssohn appears just as Ferdinand Hiller describes him in his interesting recollections: "One night as we were coming home across the deserted boulevard at a late hour, in earnest conversation, Mendelssohn suddenly stops and calls out, 'We must do some of our jumps in Paris! our jumps, I tell you! Now for it! one! two! three!—.' I don't think my jumps were very brilliant, for I was rather taken aback by the suggestion, but I shall never forget the moment." So in these letters. One moment the writer is as earnest or tender as it was in his tender and earnest nature to be; the next we find him crying out, "We must do some of our jumps," and without waiting for "one, two, three," away he goes, flying down the page. What more merry, for example, than his description to Bärmann of the clarionet-playing in the Conservatoire orchestra: "There are two clarionets, neither of them fit to dust your coat, if tone, execution, mode of playing and ordinary fairness still go for anything in this world. The first one recently, in the minuet of the Pastoral Symphony, began his solo a bar too soon, but went on puffing away as merrily as possible, never observing that it sounded quite infamous, and that some of the audience, and among them the undersigned, were making dreadful wry faces, and that the director had got stomach-ache; the horn ought then to have come in, but took fright and did not come in, on which the violins took fright also and played softer and softer, on which the thing every moment became more like a Dutch concert, for they were all out, and only a movement in three-four time being close at hand saved them from the disgrace of stopping short, and beginning all over again. So, as I was going home, it was but natural that I should think over the affair, and exclaim to myself, 'This is beyond bearing,' and instantly resolve to write to you and tell you all about it, and ask if you can look on quietly while the Parisian clarionet world is behaving in such a shabby fashion? For this fellow is a Professor in the Conservatoire, and, I understand, the best here." The date of this letter is not given, and hence we cannot know whether the writer was at all affected in his description by the treatment which the Reformation Symphony received from the Conservatoire orchestra. The Symphony was offered for performance and actually rehearsed, but the players did not take kindly to it, and the violinist, Cuvillon, spoke of the work to Hiller as "much too learned, too much fugato, too little melody," &c. For this reason, perhaps, it was never produced, and we can well believe that virtual rejection touched Mendelssohn's sensitive nature deeply, and, while not inclining him to conscious injustice, tinged his future criticisms of those who in such a manner wounded his self-love.

As already mentioned, cholera raged in the French metropolis during our master's residence there, and he did not altogether escape, so that actual suffering joined its troubles to those caused by the death of friends in Germany, and the existence of much that was unpleasant, from an artistic point of view, in Paris. Another letter to Bärmann shows, with almost comical effect, how these annoyances and his naturally cheerful disposition strove for mastery. Apologising for not having written before, he said, "Do not take it amiss, my dear fellow, for it was impossible. I was as sulky as a porpoise (Why a porpoise?), and felt as miserable during the whole winter as a fish on dry land. There was always something amiss with me, and at length I became positively ill, and was obliged to stay in bed, and submit to have my stomach rubbed by an old woman, to have warm cloths applied, to perspire a great deal, eat nothing, and undergo a great many visits and much compassion, wishing every one at the devil, swallowing peppermint pills, and bored to death. At last, by dint of constant perspiration, my bad humour and my stomach-ache were driven away, and likewise the dreaded cholera. Now that I have done with perspirations I feel, for the first time for many months, light and cheerful, and so I write to you forthwith, you capital clarionet bear and man." But Mendelssohn's merriment soon becomes tinged with the lugubrious again: "I have passed a very dull winter, what with illness and the stupidity of the circles here. Devil take them all! I never felt quite right, either as regards myself or others. . . . For some weeks past everything has come to an end, for cholera has been raging fearfully, and the people no longer think of music but of cholic. Whoever could get away, went away, and the rest do not now go out in the evening, and if I had not been forced to stay and have my stomach rubbed by an old woman, I would have been off long ago myself." Then he becomes merry again and sketches the head of one of his friends so as to show a running at the nose. Thus with alternate ups and downs, mirth and sorrow struggled to dominate his high-strung temperament.

Not less interesting and instructive than the letters quoted from above are those written at the same time to Devrient. In the summer of 1831 Devrient forwarded to Mendelssohn the libretto of a one-act Opera, "Die Kirmes," which he had written for Taubert. The packet reached our master's hands in Munich, and it would seem that all the rest of the year slipped away without its receipt being acknowledged. For this Mendelssohn properly felt bound to apologise, and we shall now see that he not only did apologise handsomely, but with a childlike simplicity of manner that must have been irresistible: "So guilty as I am towards you I never yet was to friend. Will you still deign to know me? Or do you turn away from me since I have forgotten the way to write? I have no excuse to offer; the only possible one would be that I had not received your letter, but I dare not falsify. . . . We are still as we were, and you are not angry with me; is it not so? Upon this you are to write two lines instantly, and tell me if you will have anything more to do with me, so that I may take a long breath and go in for a good gossip: there is no mistake about my being in the wrong towards you. I felt this so much when I got your letter (forwarded from Rome) and read the date, 'May,' upon it, in which you express so much friendly anxiety about me. . . . It made me feel strange, and I thought, 'He is not the one to be offended with you, because you are as you are:' and so I took heart and wrote. . . . And now be still my friend, and farewell. May it be with you, your wife and the children, as I would wish. And that is settled? We understand each other." As to the libretto, Mendelssohn took care to speak with caution even in the midst of his anxiety to please his correspondent: "I have read it many times, and rejoice in the unmistakable progress that it shows. That this progress gives me more pleasure than it can to any one else, you know, and I need not say it; but how much better this libretto appears to me than your former ones, how much more heartfelt and true it is—that I must needs tell you now. Our correspondence and confabulations show that we are of one opinion, and that from you we may expect the best of librettos seems clear to me." In this manner, Mendelssohn, with true diplomatic tact, referred his friend to the future, intimating that, at present, he hardly came up to the requisite mark. Nevertheless, he was quite willing to accept him at once as a colleague in oratorio. "I have something to ask of you, Edward, which you must answer me directly. I am to compose an oratorio for the Cecilia Society, and as I shall not be able to commence my opera in any case before July, and most likely not till after that, I shall have between next month and then a glorious quarter of a year, in which I could complete at least a portion of my oratorio, for which I have already many designs in my head. The subject is to be the Apostle Paul; the first part, the stoning of Stephen and the persecution; the second part, the conversion; the third, the Christian life and preaching, and either his martyrdom or taking leave of his congregation. I should like the words to be chiefly from the Bible and hymn-book, and a few free passages (the little Christian flock would sing perhaps the chorale in the first part): I would take the defence of Stephen from the Bible. But I cannot put these texts together myself. Will you do it? You are better acquainted with the Bible than I, and know exactly what I want. It would give you little trouble. You could do it; tell me if you will; then we will write further on the subject, for no more time must now be lost." Besides Mendelssohn's estimation of Devrient, we gather from this the interesting fact that the lines of the book of "St. Paul" were sketched by the composer himself, who was willing to leave to others only the actual selection and combination of texts. But even in this he appears to have taken some part, and corresponded for years with "our theological friends, Baur and Schubring," who essayed the task declined by Devrient, and subsequently prepared the book of "Elijah." In the same letter which referred to "St. Paul," Mendelssohn gave most remarkable expression to his real love for Devrient. No more charming peep into the depths of an affectionate nature has the publication of intimate correspondence ever allowed: "I am only going to say that I look forward with particular enjoyment to being again with you and yours. Please God, I shall soon make my appearance, and then look to it how you will get rid of me again. I promise Marie and Felix (Devrient's children) a great deal of fun and nonsense; we must have some more games at horses. I promise you a quantity of new music, and if you will promise me some rice-cake and preserves, and some singing, the preliminaries may be considered settled." Then follows the narration of an incident, the comic side of which appealed irresistibly to Mendelssohn: "A few days ago Madame Beer told me quite pleasantly that you were fearfully ill, Madame Schneider had told her so. I rush off, to find Madame Schneider has gone to a party. I follow her to a strange house, make my bow to the ladies and gentlemen, say 'Permettez,' the ladies regarding my shabby coat with silent admiration. Madame Schneider appears scarcely to know me. I ask her to be good enough to tell me about this news. She refers me to her daughter, who sits at the piano, and at last brings out, her brother had written to her two months ago that you had a cough. Hereupon I made a joyful exit, and resolved to write to you directly to thank you for being so kind as to still inhabit the earth." A passage like this requires no comment, and its effect will not be spoilt here by offering any.

In April, 1832, Mendelssohn left Paris and came over to London, where the cholera had, by that time, disappeared. He seems to have rejoiced mightily in the change, and to have allowed all his capacity of enjoying life full play amid congenial surroundings. Take in proof the following: "I wish I could only describe how happy I feel to be here once more; how much I like everything, and how gratified I am by the kindness of old friends." Take this also, to the same effect: "I cannot describe to you the happiness of these first weeks here. As, from time to time, every evil seems to accumulate, as it did in Paris during my winter there, when I lost some of my most-beloved friends, never felt quite at home, and at last became very ill; so the reverse sometimes occurs, and thus it is in this charming country, where I find old friends again, and feel myself happy and among well-wishers, and enjoy in the fullest measure the sensation of returning health. Moreover, it is warm; the lilacs are in full bloom, and music is going on. Only imagine how pleasant all this is!" But greater than all the pleasure conferred by restored health, old friends, a charming country, and blooming lilacs (there do not seem to have been any east winds in the spring of 1832), was the delight of true artistic homage, a delight Mendelssohn makes no attempt to conceal, expressing it rather with the enthusiasm of a boy. One "happy morning" he attended a Philharmonic rehearsal at the Hanover Square Rooms, and—but let the sequel be told by himself: "After Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, during which I was in a box, I wished to go into the room to talk to some old friends; scarcely, however, had I gone down below when one of the orchestra called out, 'There is Mendelssohn!' on which they all began shouting and clapping their hands to such a degree that for a time I really did not know what to do; and when this was over another called out, 'Welcome to him!' on which the same uproar recommenced, and I was obliged to cross the room, clamber into the orchestra, and return thanks. Never can I forget it, for it was more precious to me than any distinction, as it showed me that the musicians loved me, and rejoiced at my coming, and I cannot tell you what a glad feeling this was." Moments of this kind are oases in the desert of life, and our master soon found himself surrounded once again by stern and troublesome circumstances. First came news of the illness of his old teacher, Zelter, Conductor of the Vocal Academy at Berlin. Zelter, who had been a master stonemason in his time, was not a great musician, but Mendelssohn entertained for him much affection, and wrote back to Berlin: "God grant that Zelter may by this time be safe and out of danger. You say, indeed, he is already so, but I shall anxiously expect your next letter to see the news of his recovery confirmed. I have dreaded this ever since Goethe's death, but when it actually occurs it is a very different thing. May Heaven avert it." The old man's ailment brought other serious considerations in its wake. It appears that at some time or other previous, Mendelssohn had been spoken to about taking a post in the Academy, and the master's father obviously wished that, at Zelter's death, Felix might succeed him. Hence he wrote to his son in London: "There is no doubt that Zelter both wishes and requires to have you with him, because, at all events for the present, it is quite impossible for him to carry on the Academy, whence it is evident that if you do not undertake it another must." In the Berlin family council it had clearly been decided that Felix was to associate himself with Zelter at the Academy, so as to step into his shoes when the old professor finally retired. But the family council reckoned without Mendelssohn's acute sense of what was due to his own self-respect, and the subjoined reply must have caused no little astonishment: "Has Zelter expressed this wish to you, or do you only imagine that he entertains it? If the former were the case, I would instantly, on receiving your reply, write to Zelter and offer him every service in my power of every kind, and try to relieve him from all his labours for as long a period as he desired; and this it certainly would be my duty to do. I intended to have written to Lichstenstein before my return about the proposal formerly made to me, but, of course, I have given up all thoughts of doing so at present; for on no account would I assume that Zelter could not resume his duties, and, even in that event, I could not reconcile myself to discuss the matter with anybody but himself; every other mode of proceeding I should consider unfair towards him. If, however, he requires my services, I am ready, and shall rejoice if I can be of any use to him, but still more so if he does not want me and is entirely recovered." The high-toned magnanimity of these words will not escape admiring notice. As Zelter's friend, Mendelssohn was ready to do anything, but he would make no movement which might be construed as the manœuvre of a candidate for the place his friend held by so frail a tenure. Soon, however, Zelter died, and the situation assumed an entirely new aspect. Mendelssohn's friends urged him to return at once as a candidate for the vacant place, but he flatly refused to do anything of the sort: "I shall return as soon as I can, because my father writes that he wishes me to do so; I therefore intend to set off in about a fortnight, but solely for that reason; the other motive would rather tend to detain me here, indeed, if any motive could do so; for I will in no manner solicit the situation." And why not? it may be asked, since Zelter was dead. The answer is first, because Mendelssohn looked upon the conductorship as "only an honorary post," for which he could not sue. "If they were to offer it to me I would accept it, because I promised formerly to do so; but only for a settled time and on certain conditions; and if they do not intend to offer it then my presence can be of no possible use. I do not certainly require to convince them of my capability for the office, and I neither will nor can make interest." This may seem high ground for a young man in his twenty-third year to take, but the young man was Mendelssohn, in whom genius and an honourable pride in its possession coexisted. Moreover, to that high ground he adhered: "I beg that no step of any kind may be taken on my behalf, except that which my father mentioned concerning my immediate return; but nothing in the smallest degree approaching to solicitation; and when they do make their choice, I only hope that they may find a man who will perform his duties with as much zeal as old Zelter." In reply to this, a letter soon came from Mendelssohn's father which, in turn, elicited a yet more definite statement to the same effect. After repeating much that has been already quoted, the master went on: "If I solicit it (the directorship) I am bound to accept the place as they choose to give it, and to comply with their conditions as to salary, duties, &c., though I do not as yet even know what these are. In the second place, the reason they gave you why I should write seems to me neither a true nor a straightforward one. They say they wish to be certain I will accept it, and that, on this account, I must enrol myself among the candidates; but when they offered it to me three years ago, Lichstenstein said they did so to ascertain if I would take it, and begged me to give a distinct answer on the point. At that time I said 'Yes,' that I was willing to carry it on, along with Rungenhagen. I am not sure that I should think the same now; but as I said so then, I cannot draw back, and must keep my word. It is not necessary to repeat my assent, for as I once gave it so it must remain; still less can I do so when I should have to offer myself to them for the post they once offered to me. If they were disposed to adhere to their former offer they would not require me to take a step which they took themselves three years ago; on the contrary, they would remember the assent I then gave, for they must know I am incapable of breaking a promise. A confirmation of my former promise is, therefore, quite unnecessary, and if they intend to appoint another to the situation, my letter would not prevent their doing so." The sequel, as told by Devrient, proves that Mendelssohn fils in London had a much clearer perception of the actual situation than Mendelssohn père in Berlin. Rungenhagen, who long acted as Zelter's deputy, had many friends, and a strong body of members were of opinion that, albeit lacking Mendelssohn's brilliant talents, he could not be passed over. The matter was debated for six months, and then an effort was made to compromise it by appointing a double conductorship, with Rungenhagen as the first of two equals, Mendelssohn all the time declining to appear as an avowed candidate. Hot and stormy were the discussions that arose, some members declaring that "well-born" ladies and gentlemen were not to be dictated to by so young a man, and others protesting that, the Academy being a Christian institution, it was absurd to put a Jewish lad at the head. Nevertheless, the joint conductorship would have been established but for Rungenhagen himself, who would have all or none, and demanded that the question should be put to the vote. To the vote it was accordingly put in January, 1833, with the following result: Rungenhagen, 148; Mendelssohn, 88; Grell, 4. Devrient, Mendelssohn's foremost champion, was excessively mortified at this defeat, while the composer's family took it so much to heart that they seceded in a body from the Academy. As for the master himself he preserved entire calmness, and whatever pain the rebuff entailed probably arose from a feeling that he should have adhered strictly to first impulse, and not even have sanctioned a candidature promoted by well-meaning though mistaken friends against his own better judgment.

EASY RULE FOR TUNING ORGANS AND HARMONIUMS IN EQUAL TEMPERAMENT.

By Alexander J. Ellis, F.R.S.

The following rule is intended to supply an easy mechanical method of tuning in Equal Temperament without sensible error. It was originally given in my translation of Helmholtz's "Sensations of Tone" (p. 785), and was mentioned with approval by Mr. Bosanquet in his work on "Temperament" (p. 5). It is now presented in a greatly improved form. It is especially adapted to organs and harmoniums, as the pianoforte tones are not sustained enough for counting beats with certainty; but it will be found valuable even to pianoforte-tuners. It is suitable for all pitches from C 500, which is as flat as our flattest organs in cold weather, up to at least C 587·5, which is the enormously high pitch of the St. James's Church Organ at Hamburg. The examples given are, for English band-pitch, C 540, and French pitch, A 435·4 (not A 435, as appears from measurements of the diapason normal itself at the Musée du Conservatoire at Paris, taken in 1878).

Apparatus.—Besides the tuning tools, either a seconds watch or else two little pendulums swinging twice and three times in the second. These can be made with quite sufficient accuracy by passing a thin thread or piece of sewing silk through a heavy button and tying it in a complete loop, so that one end can be passed over a pencil or smooth wire or nail. The whole length of the double loop, or swinging length of the pendulum, should be 9 inches 12½ sixteenths for the half-second, and 4 inches 5½ sixteenths for the third of a second pendulum. But any clockmaker would make them of metal with a bob that screws, and then they could be carefully adjusted to accurate time.

Rule.—For Organs and Harmoniums.—Take the bearings on the one-foot octave only, from c″ on the third space of the treble to the b″ above.

1. For High Pitches.—Take the c″ to any pitch required, or leave it as it stands. Tune by fifths up and fourths down, making the note to be tuned at first tolerably correct for perfect intervals (that is, without sensible beats), and then flattening it in each case, so as to make the fifths beat twice and the fourths beat three times in a second. See Scheme No. 1.

2. For Medium Pitches, near to French Pitch.—Begin with a″, and tune by fifths down and fourths up till you reach c‴, always bringing the note to be tuned nearly correct for perfect intervals (that is, without sensible beats), and then sharpening it in each case, so as to make the fifths beat twice and the fourths three times in a second. Then begin again at a″, and proceed as in the first case. See Scheme No. 2.

3. For very Low Pitches indeed, as for very Flat Organs in Winter.—Begin with a″ and tune as in the last case by a fifth down to d″ and then by a fourth up to g″, sharpening the note to be tuned after making it nearly perfect. Then begin again with a″, and proceed as in the first case, but continue the process to b″♯ = c‴. See Scheme No. 3.

The remaining octaves will then be tuned from the bearings in the usual way, and the result may be verified by beats. But it must be remembered that the two beats and three beats of the fifths and fourths which occur in one second in the one-foot octave occur in two seconds in the two-foot octave, in four seconds in the four-foot octave, and in eight seconds in the eight-foot octave. Such beats are too slow to tune by, but serve well as a verification.

Schemes for Tuning.

Notes already tuned, white. Notes to be tuned, black. Number of beats to be heard in a second written below each interval.

No. 1. For High Pitches.

Bring the black note to form nearly a perfect fifth or fourth, as the case may be, with the white, and then flatten it.

No. 2. For Medium Pitches, near French Pitch.

No. 3. For extremely Low Pitches.

The bearings should be laid down with the utmost accuracy, the beats counted, if possible, for ten seconds, the bellows being well filled and not repumped during the count of any one set of beats; each set of beats should be counted three or four times over, and the work should be rigidly revised, when the bearings have been completely tuned, by recounting the beats, if possible, by some other person and not the tuner. This gives a mechanical proof of the work not otherwise possible. Not till then should the rest of the instrument be tuned. It is important for the organ that the temperature should remain constant while the bearings are taken, but the actual temperature is indifferent, and the octaves from these bearings may be taken at any other temperature. To prevent inequalities of temperature while tuning the bearings, great care should be taken not to heat the pipes by touching them, or by bringing the body too close, and no pipe after tuning should be removed from its place.

When great accuracy is required it is important that the reeds of harmoniums should be allowed to settle for a day or two after the bearings have been taken, and then be re-proved by counting the beats, before the other octaves are tuned from them.

For Pianofortes.—The beats last so short a time that the rule requires modification. The bearings should be taken exactly one octave lower than in the schemes, that is, in the two-foot octave. The fifths should beat four times and the fourths six times in four seconds, the utmost time for which they can be counted with accuracy. Hence it is not possible to secure such perfect evenness of temperament on the pianoforte as on the organ and harmonium, but the error is not so easily perceived, and the resulting equality is much greater than can be secured by mere estimation of ear. Of course the bearings must be taken on single strings, the others being damped, and great care should be subsequently taken with the unisons. If two or three pianos are being tuned in the same room at the same time, great practice is necessary to distinguish the beats.

Precaution in counting Beats.—It is usual in counting to begin with one. If we begin to count one at the beginning of the first second, two at the beginning of the second second, and so on, we shall have said six at the beginning of the sixth second, which is also at the end of the fifth second; that is, we shall have counted for only five entire seconds, and the beats will have been five (not six) in five seconds—that is, one in a single second. We must, therefore, always throw off one from our count for beginning with one in place of nought. Great mistakes are often made in counting beats from neglecting this precaution. The tuner should practise counting the ticks of a watch, which will be generally four or three in one second, or five in two seconds. Clocks tick one, two, and four times in a second.

Examples.

The columns Correct give the pitches (that is, the numbers of double vibrations in one second) which each note in the scale ought to have, if it were tuned in mathematically equal temperament, for Band Pitch, c″ 540, and French Pitch, a″ 870·80. They are all continued to two places of decimals, so that if the point is disregarded the figures show the number of double vibrations in a hundred seconds.

The columns By Rule give the pitches of each note as they would have if tuned with mathematical accuracy by my rule. It will be seen that the two sets of pitches—Correct and By Rule—never differ by two-tenths, that is, one-fifth of a vibration, or one vibration in five seconds, a difference which Professor W. Preyer, of Jena, has proved to be insensible in any part of the great scale.

The columns headed Error give the nearest number of thousandths of an equal semitone by which a note, as tuned by rule, is sharper (♯) or flatter (♭) than it would be if tuned in perfectly equal temperament. It will be seen that the largest error (marked 4♭) is less than the two-hundred and fiftieth part of a semitone too flat, and is absolutely inappreciable by the finest ear.

The notes should have been doubly accented as belonging to the one-foot octave, but the accents are omitted for convenience.

Band Pitch.				French Pitch.
Notes.	Correct.	By Rule	Error.	Notes.	Correct	By Rule	Error.
c	540·00	540·00	0	c	517·78	517·93	0
c♯	572·11	572·08	1♭	c♯	548·58	548·55	0
d	606·12	606·00	4♭	d	581·20	581·20	0
d♯	642·17	642·09	2♭	d♯	615·76	615·62	4♭
e	680·30	680·25	2♭	e	652·37	652·35	0
f	720·78	720·85	1♯	f	691·17	691·07	2♭
f♯	763·67	763·78	2♯	f♯	732·27	732·40	3♯
g	809·07	809·00	2♭	g	775·80	775·93	3♯
g♯	857·20	857·12	2♭	g♯	821·94	821·83	2♭
a	908·17	908·00	3♭	a	870·80	870·80	0
b	1019·36	1019·37	0	b	977·44	977·53	2♭

If we calculate the beats in one second of the fifths and fourths of mathematically equal temperament in these two cases from the numbers given in the columns called Correct, in order to contrast them with the constant two and three beats of the fifths and fourths when tuning By Rule, we find them as follows:—

Band Pitch.		French Pitch.
Fifths.	Beats.	Fifths.	Beats.
c g	1·86	c g	1·74
c♯ g♯	1·93	c♯ g♯	1·86
d a	2·02	d a	2·00
d♯ a♯	2·19	d♯ a♯	2·08
e b	2·18	e b	2·23
Fourths.	Beats.	Fourths.	Beats.
c f	2·34	c f	2·39
c♯ f♯	2·57	c♯ f♯	2·39
d g	2·73	d g	2·60
d♯ g♯	2·92	d♯ g♯	2·78
e a	3·31	e a	2·92
f b♭	3·56	f b♭	3·12
f♯ b	3·40	f♯ b	3·24

If we take the average of these beats, excluding the fourth c f, which is not tuned by the rule, we find:—

Mean of Beats of	Band Pitch.	French Pitch.	Mean of both.
Fifths	2·03	1·98	2·005
Fourths	3·05	2·84	2·945

It appears, therefore, that the rule gives as nearly as possible the mean amount of beats in all cases, being sometimes too much and sometimes too little by an extremely small amount. It was upon such observations that the rule was originally founded.

As the notice of the Birmingham Musical Festival which appears in our present number deals exclusively with the musical portion of the meeting, it may perhaps interest many of our readers to know that some of the leading local papers appear to think it necessary to touch on other matters. For instance, in a "gushing" article in one journal we read that Madame Gerster was "pale and serious," that her "fair hair was without any covering of hat or bonnet," and that she was "attired in a delicate French grey costume, with the fashionable brocaded skirt;" that Madame Patey was "in deep peacock blue, with lemon-coloured bonnet," and that she looked "a picture of health and matronly comeliness;" that Madame Trebelli was dressed "with all a Frenchwoman's taste in an elegant black costume, rich with lace, and a bonnet of white sprays on a dark sage-green ground;" and that Mrs. Sutton was "tastefully attired in pale primrose." Even presuming that we were sufficiently conversant with these millinery details to describe them in such professional language, we should certainly have thought it no part of our duty; but had we been able to record such interesting facts, and ventured no opinion upon the music at the following Hereford Festival, we should at least have warded off the attack of a local journalist, who, because unlimited praise is not given to the "provincials," tells the metropolitan critics that "London does not monopolise all the wit, wisdom, and worth of England—that all who live outside the twelve-mile radius are not fools because they can neither hear Big Ben or have the misfortune to be taxed by 'vestries.'" As those who attend for the press may, however, be considered "guests" for the time, these remarks are said to be offered "in the kindliest spirit towards the offenders." Now does not this irate writer perceive that, without being a "fool," it is possible that, judging within his limited vision of artistic results, he would be more liable to error than one who not only hears "Big Ben" but all the greatest artists the world produces? and that a critic has no right to be considered a "guest" because he dwells temporarily in a city, or treated as an "offender" because he fearlessly does his duty?

Every true lover of music must watch with pleasure the rapid spread of Choral Societies, at the public concerts of which we have the result of the labour of many months, cheerfully given by the members, not only for their individual gratification, but, as we can testify from our own experience, really with an abstract desire to make known those works which are passed over by ordinary concert-givers, who are necessarily compelled to consult commercial rather than artistic value in the selection of their programmes. But with every hope that such institutions may continue to flourish and increase, we should be glad if by their side well-organised private societies for the cultivation of either vocal or instrumental music could be more extensively formed. Thibaut, in his excellent work on "Purity in Musical Art," after eloquently advocating the establishment of these delightful social unions, especially dwells upon the necessity of guarding against the intrusion of that frivolity which too often creeps into such gatherings. "The first and most essential condition for such a society," he says, "is that the members are judiciously chosen, that genuine lovers of art combine together, that care is taken to secure an equal distribution of voices, and to nourish to the full the love and enjoyment of true art. Consequently an evening devoted to singing must take precedence of all ordinary eating and drinking engagements, and all the members must feel that an association that requires their united efforts to form and maintain must not be at the mercy of other ordinary pleasures, especially as, while in other gatherings the absence of one is not much felt, here the absence of a single voice may quite possibly bring the whole thing to a deadlock, and this even in choruses, where a single efficient voice may be an indispensable support to the rest." These words cannot be too much taken to heart; and as we have now so many competent musical amateurs, and the means for collecting a library are placed within easy reach, there can be no reason why such societies should languish for want of members or for material to carry on their good work.

That the Sunday League has done much towards bringing good music, without cost, to the people, instead of making the people go, at very serious cost, to the music, is now a fact sufficiently attested by the large numbers attending the excellent instrumental performances which take place every Sunday in the Regent's Park. But the following paragraph, which appeared in the Daily Telegraph of the 15th ult., must have surprised even the most sanguine members of the above-named Association: "Canon Wilberforce permitted a performance of sacred music by the band of the 1st Hants Engineers in the Deanery grounds this (Sunday) afternoon. Thousands of persons were present, and their conduct was most orderly." This news, from Southampton, shows not only that many of the clergy have no desire to oppose, but that some actually encourage the progress of this movement. One more sign of the times may also be found in the announcement of "The Coffee Music Hall Company, Limited," the list of the "Provisional Council" of which includes the names of the Very Reverend the Dean of Westminster, Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Rev. Canon Duckworth, and a large number of ladies and gentlemen of such high position as to form a sufficient guarantee for the stability of this Joint Stock Company, in which the public is now invited to take shares. Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are also, we find, on the Council; so that it may reasonably be supposed that the promise of the Company to provide an "entertainment to which any man may take his wife and daughters, or even allow his wife and daughters to go by themselves," can be confidently relied upon. All this distinguished patronage of an undertaking expressly designed for enabling the people to hear music at a reasonable outlay will, we trust, be accepted as a convincing proof that the opposition to "Music Halls" was never directed against the institutions themselves, but against the kind of entertainment provided. The "music" in the Hall of the past demanded "stimulants" for its due enjoyment; but that in the Hall of the future may be appropriately accompanied by "refreshments."

Lively M. de Retz, who keeps the readers of Le Ménestrel well informed concerning the doings of the London Opera season, has now given them an account in his best vein of a visit to Madame Patti. Our spirituel friend, it appears, intrusted himself to the Great Eastern Railway, and passed through the towns of Bristol and Cardiff—in itself a remarkable achievement. At last he reached Glamorganshire, and halted at a village called Bridgend, where a dialogue took place. "Where is Watertown Hall?" "This way, your honour. When you come to the river turn to the left. One shilling." "How! a shilling!" "Yes, your honour. Every time the lady at the Hall meets me, she gives me one. You are a friend of the lady." "Admirably reasoned. Here is your shilling." Following the direction paid for,

M. de Retz came upon a "construction assez bizarre," half farm, half mansion, to which an enormous round tower gave a baronial air. Only one pull at the bell and the door opened, which proved to our friend that the servant was French, since an English domestic always keeps one waiting ten minutes. Then followed an interview with Caroline, "the best page in petticoats that ever waited on an operatic queen." "Madame is not visible," said Caroline. "How not visible? She expects us." "That is why she is not visible." "Where is she?" "At the bottom of the garden near the river. You will see her in a white dress and big hat, motionless as a statue." "Is she studying 'Lohengrin'? I do not see the swan." "Madame never studies." "Is she writing to her lawyers?" "Madame never transacts business." "Is she reading once more the chivalrous article that appeared in the Daily Telegraph concerning her benefit?" "Madame never reads the papers." "Then what is she doing?" "Catching trout for your dinner." "Dear reader," exclaims the ecstatic De Retz, "you have often entertained the strangest desires and given rein to the wildest aspirations, but did you ever dream of, one day, making a dinner of trout caught by Patti?" We can conscientiously answer, "Never."

Turning over the leaves of a volume of vocal music the other day—bound in calf, with a carefully written-out list of contents, as was the custom in former times—we could not but be struck with the character of the words of most of the songs. True it is that in modern compositions for the voice the poetry is not usually of a high character; but then it is at least adapted to a refined drawing-room audience, and often founded either upon the hopeless passion of some one who has been left desolate and alone, or the love of a parent for a dying child. But a very considerable number of the songs which found favour in the last generation glorified the delights of fighting or eating and drinking in a style which to us appears almost repulsive. In the book above referred to, for example, is a well known song, in which the following verse—a fair specimen of the entire composition—occurs:—

> Stand to your guns, my hearts of oak;
> Let not a word on board be spoke;
> Victory soon will crown the joke;
> Be silent, and be ready.

To say nothing of the grammatical construction of these lines, surely "joke" is not such an excellent rhyme to "oak" that it should thus most absurdly be made to do duty for a more appropriate word. Then, after a "broadside"—represented musically by a rapid descending scale—attention is thus drawn to the state of the enemy's ship:—

> See the blood, in purple tide,
> Trickle down her batter'd side; lines which we remember to have been usually received with rapturous applause. As a sample of the "gormandising" school of writing, part of a glee, popular in its day, called "The Alderman's Thumb," by Dr. Harrington, may be cited:—

> Why tempts yon turtle sprawling,
> Why smokes the glorious haunch?
> Are these not joys still calling
> To bless our mortal paunch?

Our readers will, we think, agree with us that the elegant inanity of the present day is better than the course realism of the past.

Honest men can entertain nothing but profound contempt for journalists—if such there be—who sell their pens regardless of their opinions. The bare transaction is not very creditable, but the supreme disgrace it entails arises from the fact that an innocent and confiding public, knowing nothing of what has taken place behind the scenes, are liable to be bamboozled and cheated by accepting as a candid opinion that which the writer has been paid to say. Hired advocacy, when understood to be such—in the case of a barrister, for instance—is perhaps tolerable. The world knows that its eloquence flows according to tariff, and that its sentiments are a reality or a sham as the case may be. Anyhow, it is honest and aboveboard, wherefore we may fairly congratulate an American contemporary upon the frank manner in which he has announced that his leaders and paragraphs are in the market. "Terms for editorial articles and notices can be had by applying to the editor." So runs the statement of our contemporary. He, good, honest man, will have nothing to do with "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain." Standing in the full light of day, he holds up his pen and demands a bidder, while quite willing, and we venture to say desirous, that all the world should regard as bought and paid for whatever may henceforth appear in his columns for a consideration. But to this end he should make some conspicuous distinction between leaders written to order and others which may have to be indited when business is slack. So frank and open an editor does not wish to deceive even by accident, and it will be well, therefore, to attach some mark to hired eloquence, by which its true character can readily be distinguished. In that case his readers, to use a familiar expression, will "know what's what." It may be, however, that our contemporary's customers object to such a course, believing that they buy the editor's repute for independent judgment as well as his pen. This is a difficulty, no doubt, but when was the path of the honest man free from obstacles?

We have always earnestly advocated the advisability of musical pupils, either singers or players, studying harmony. A knowledge even of the elementary principles of the science not only enables vocalists and instrumentalists to understand thoroughly the works they are interpreting, but it gives them confidence in their performance, and instils a sympathetic feeling of confidence in their listeners. Yet we can no more understand why those who learn the grammar of music should become composers than why those who learn the grammar of language should become authors. The creative gift is an extremely rare one; but so little is this truth acknowledged that teachers of harmony are constantly asked by their pupils how long it will be before they are able to compose. That this delusion, so far from being rooted out, is duly fostered may be gathered from the advertisements daily appearing in the papers that a professor undertakes, "for a consideration," to correct and revise for publication any musical manuscripts which may be sent to him; and, as nothing in these advertisements is ever said about works being first submitted for approval, we may of course presume that even the veriest trash will be not only "corrected and revised," but actually printed, published, and sent for review. Now amongst the advertisements of the day we do not see that an author is prepared to put the writings of any ambitious amateur into sufficiently good English to allow of their publication; that an artist is ready to touch up the paintings of ladies and gentlemen so that they may be exhibited as their own; or that a sculptor will receive the clumsy statues of bunglers in the art, and by the exercise of his talent render them fit for the market. Surely, then, it should not be the office of a cultivated professor to aid in bringing the crude musical attempts of those who fancy themselves composers from their legitimate home amongst an exclusive little coterie of flatterers into the real world of art.

A story told of the new French tenor, M. Mouliérat, is worth repeating. The son of a fisherman, and himself brought up to the sea, he a few years ago drew an unlucky number in the conscription and was absorbed into the ranks of the 18th Chasseurs, where he soon became famous as a troller of soldier's songs. In the ordinary course he would have served his time and perhaps have gone back to fishing, but accident placed him instead on the stage of the Opéra-Comique. This is how it happened. Some time during the summer of 1875 Marshal McMahon reviewed the garrison of Paris at Longchamps, one brigade consisting of the 18th Chasseurs and the 46th of the Line. The manœuvres were relieved by an interval for refreshment, during which the Linesmen gathered round and loudly applauded the songs of one of their number. "Pooh!" exclaimed a Chasseur, "we have in the 18th a fellow who can sing a great deal better than that." He was, of course, challenged to produce him, whereupon Mouliérat came forward and regaled his comrades with the patriotic hymn of Alsace-Lorraine. As luck would have it, Brigadier-General Bocher was within hearing, and, struck by the voice of the young warrior, ordered him to report himself at head-quarters the next morning. In the result, Private Mouliérat carried a letter from the General to M. Grosset of the Conservatoire, and France soon had a soldier the less. What a chapter of accidents is here. Had not the Linesman sung, had not the jealous Chasseur boasted of the nightingale in his own corps, had not Mouliérat accepted the challenge, and had not General Bocher been within earshot, M. Carvalho's tenor might now be catching fish in the Atlantic or mayhap drilling recruits in a barrack-yard.

Some time ago, in a review upon a method of copying music, the great merit of which was stated to be that it would quite save the expense of purchasing new publications, we ventured to suggest that to multiply any copyright works was an infringement of the law especially framed for the protection of authors. Of course this drew an angry letter from the proprietor of the article noticed; and we are glad therefore now to give an opportunity for the other side to be heard. In our present number will be found a communication from a well-known organist and composer complaining of "the habit which prevails in some Cathedrals of copying, without permission, the vocal parts of copyright music for use during Divine Service," and asking us to make "some definite statement" upon the subject in our columns. The Act expressly says "that the word 'Copyright' shall be construed to mean the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word is herein applied." Surely the meaning of this is clear enough to convince all that the practice is illegal; and it should need, therefore, but an appeal to their honour to discontinue it.

THE BIRMINGHAM AND HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVALS.

By Henry C. Lunn.

We are quite certain that our readers will thank us if in our notice of the Birmingham Triennial Festival we abstain from any allusion to the now well-quoted work of Mr. John Thackray Bunce; for, interesting as are the details in that volume of the foundation of the General Hospital and the establishment of the Musical Festivals for the benefit of its funds, the records of this year's meeting are really of primary importance. In proof of the growing love for music—coupled, we hope, with an equal love for that charity which it has ever been the mission of the art to promote—we may, however, preface our observations by alluding to the gratifying fact that the profits of these Festivals have recently enormously increased, that of 1873, especially, reaching the sum of £6,577; and although at the present meeting the returns have fallen below what was anticipated, we have every reason to believe that this has been caused more by that depression which has recently affected every undertaking of this kind than by any diminution of sympathy with the objects of the Festival. There has been latterly so great a rage for "monster meetings," that Birmingham has a right to feel proud at the success which has attended its triennial gatherings, seeing that the quality of the performances rather than the quantity of the performers has invariably been the attraction held out to the public. In truth it may be affirmed that the choir is kept in a state of permanent efficiency; and that, at the time of the Festival, like a well-organised army called into active service, every man is found fully prepared for his duty. That so disciplined a body, even of comparatively limited dimensions, is infinitely superior to a huge mass of singers, suddenly summoned from all parts of the country to execute the most exacting music with two or three rehearsals may be easily proved by listening to the tone of the Birmingham choir and contrasting it with that of more than double the number of vocalists in more than double the space, not to dwell upon the effect, in the Birmingham Town Hall, of the exquisite balance of power between choir and band.

The members of the Festival Committee announced that they had done all in their power to secure new works for the present meeting; but the result was certainly somewhat disappointing. If M. Gounod declined to contribute a composition unless £4,000 were guaranteed to him, we cannot blame the Committee for declining to accede to such preposterous terms; but surely this offer could have been made in time to allow of negotiations with other composers, if necessary. We have been taught to look to Birmingham for the production of works of importance, and the performance of two Cantatas, only one of which was written especially for the Festival, was scarcely sufficient to satisfy the public and sustain the prestige of the meetings. We will not now dwell upon the many almost unknown, but great, compositions which—failing the possibility of procuring novelties—might have been selected; but, considering the resources at command, it cannot but cause surprise that Bach, amongst the older writers, and Schumann, amongst the modern ones, should have been ignored.

On the opening morning of the Festival, Tuesday, August 26, "Elijah," as usual, attracted a large audience. Much interest was of course excited by the first appearance of Madame Gerster as an Oratorio singer; and although we cannot say that the result was everything that could be desired, there can be no question that she displayed talents of a very high order; and that, especially in the dramatic scene of the Widow with the Prophet, she achieved a marked success. In "Hear ye, Israel," however, where religious fervour rather than dramatic instinct is demanded, the effect, in spite of her excellent intonation and trained vocalisation, was somewhat disappointing; and this was also felt in the Quartett and Chorus, "Holy, holy," the high soprano notes in which require something beyond mere accuracy and power. Mr. Santley's best solos were "It is enough" and "Lord God of Abraham;" the whole of the declamatory portions, which form so important a feature in the music assigned to the Prophet, although being artistically and earnestly delivered, lacking that energy demanded for their due effect. The contralto solos in the first part were sung by Madame Trebelli, and in the second part by Madame Patey; the tenor solos being divided in the same manner between Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Vernon Rigby, efficient aid having been contributed in some of the concerted music by Mrs. Sutton, Messrs. Woodhall, Pountney, and Campion. The singing of the choruses throughout the work was simply superb: never, even at Birmingham, have we heard so perfect a rendering of "Thanks be to God," the jubilant portions of which were thrilling in the extreme; and in the fine Chorus, "Behold! God the Lord passed by," the delicacy with which the phrase "And after the fire there came a still, small voice" was given proved how thoroughly the varied gradations of tone were under command. If the choralists wished to atone for some few shortcomings in their singing of this Oratorio at the last Festival, they may rest assured that they were quite successful, and that their portion, at least, of the performance of 1879 will be long remembered as a perfect triumph.

The Miscellaneous Concert in the evening commenced with Max Bruch's Cantata "The Lay of the Bell," which, although not written for the Festival, was placed in the hands of the Committee for its first public performance in this country. We have always rumours of the forthcoming works at the Birmingham Festival, and when it was first announced that a composition of Max Bruch's was to be given, "The Lady of the Lake" was the subject mentioned as having been chosen. Now there can be no question that a decidedly Scottish subject demands what is termed a "local colour" in the music; and as Professor Macfarren has recently taken the theme of Scott's poem for a Cantata, we are glad to find that the German composer has not entered into competition with him, since an almost unavoidable similarity must have provoked comparisons which are better avoided. But Schiller's "Lay of the Bell" is a subject which necessitates no national peculiarity in its musical setting, a fact sufficiently proved by the Cantata of Max Bruch's, now heard for the first time in England, being as widely opposed in style to Romberg's well-known "Lay of the Bell" as if they were composed to totally different themes. In Romberg's treatment of the text we could scarcely cite a movement which shows high dramatic power, yet there is a charming freshness pervading the entire composition which cannot fail to please all who are content with melody and clearly defined writing. Max Bruch, on the contrary, has endeavoured to give almost a massive grandeur to the choral portions of his work; and many of his solos are so boldly defined, especially those for the Master, as to make us regret that they were partially shorn of their effect by being sung from an orchestra by vocalists in evening costume instead of from the stage, with all the accessories of appropriate dress and scenery. The ceremony of the casting of the bell is in Schiller's poem shaped into a tempting libretto for the composer's art, the gradual progress of the work suggesting many episodes in human life around which some exquisite poetry is woven. The original has been happily translated by Mrs. Natalia Macfarren, who brings to her task not only a thorough knowledge of German, but a true perception of the English words which will most appropriately fit the music. The Cantata opens with a vocal introduction, the tenors and basses in unison, which announces impressively the theme of the work. A bass Solo for the Master, with Chorus, "Fast immured in earthly hollow," is well written for the voice (although, like most of the solos for the Master, somewhat lugubrious), and contains a theme afterwards heard when reference is made to the making or casting of the bell. After a brief instrumental Prelude, a charming Chorus, "Joy shall its solemn chime betoken," occurs, the masterly writing in which created a profound impression, and elicited so much applause as to compel the composer, who conducted the work, to bow his acknowledgments. A tenor Recitative then introduces a flowing and melodious solo, "Oh, could ye linger," the theme of which is used effectively in the following Quartett and Chorus, the latter a vigorous composition occasionally written in eight parts. The orchestral treatment of this piece is deserving of much praise, the sustained notes of the wind instruments and the clever writing of the strings in the accompaniment adding much vitality to the vocal parts. The solo of the Master, "Lo, the mass grows brown and cleareth," followed by some comparatively unimportant Recitatives for alto and bass, lead to a florid soprano solo, in the accompaniments to which the wind instruments are effectively employed. The following Chorus, "The man must afield," opening with a well-marked subject for the male voices, and succeeded by a placid theme for sopranos and altos, contains much clever but somewhat restless writing. The next important number is a Chorus in C minor, "Hark! the signal of alarm," the dramatic power in which, descriptive of a sudden outbreak of fire, is of a very high order, although we cannot affirm that we are struck with that individuality of style which unmistakably marks the work of genius. Some Recitatives with a Quartett and Chorus, "One fond look," appropriately placid in character, conclude the first part of the Cantata. A solo for the Master, "Deep in clay the ore lies buried," commences the second part; and after a brief Recitative for the same voice, a dirge-like Chorus, in F sharp minor, succeeds, the pathos of which seemed scarcely felt by the audience. The contralto solo, "Ah, the wife belov'd is summon'd," is somewhat commonplace; nor indeed can we award much praise to the solo of the Master or the following "Intermezzo," as it is termed, although the latter piece contains some well-considered writing both for voices and instruments, and, being pastoral in character, affords a welcome contrast to the many fully scored numbers which precede it. The two next pieces, however, amply compensate for this temporary falling off in the interest of the composition. The first, a Chorus, "Hallow'd order," is certainly the best wrought-out choral number in the Cantata, the fugal treatment of the themes, the boldness of the harmonies, and the richness and elaboration of the instrumentation amply evidencing the scholastic training, if not the original thought, of the composer. The following number, "Peace benignant," a melodious and placid Trio for soprano, alto, and tenor, is an excellent specimen of the composer's power of writing quiet music without striving after those effects which never come by striving. A scene, too much lengthened, in which, however, there are some extremely dramatic solos for the contralto, tenor, and bass voices; a somewhat noisy, warlike Chorus in C sharp minor; and a Recitative for the Master, are followed by an important and well-written Quartett and Chorus, "This be the duty of the bell," effectively commenced by orchestra and organ. The finale, a Quartett and Chorus, containing a recurrence to the theme of the first bass solo, includes several clever imitative phrases, but it is heavily—even noisily—scored throughout. There is certainly some good contrapuntal writing in this, as in other choral pieces in the work; but counterpoint, after all, is only a means to an end; and Max Bruch, although an apt musical scholar, is too prone, instead of adapting his forms to the requirements of his text, to adapt the text to the requirements of his forms. On the whole, however, we are inclined to pronounce a favourable verdict upon the Cantata. True it is that there is much of the mysticism of that "advanced school" which is now doing battle with the clear and intelligible style of those composers who have lifted music into its present high position; but there is a coherence in the writing which enables us to follow—even if we do not always agree with—the composer's intentions; and the instrumentation throughout, although occasionally somewhat redundant, is seldom ineffective, and never crude. Of the execution of the work, both by the vocalists and instrumentalists, we must speak in the highest terms. The principal singers—Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Trebelli, Mr. Vernon Rigby and Herr Henschel—were thoroughly efficient; and although the solos of the Master were delivered roughly by Herr Henschel, such roughness did not ill accord with the character of the music assigned to him. The work was received throughout with the warmest applause, and at the conclusion the composer was greeted with a perfect ovation. The miscellaneous second part of the concert—commencing with the overture to "Semiramide" and terminating with that to "Fra Diavolo"—included vocal selections by Madame Gerster (who was encored for her brilliant rendering of Mozart's "show" song from "Il Flauto Magico," "Gli angui d' inferno"), Miss Anna Williams (who displayed an excellent voice, but little dramatic power in the hackneyed Scena "Roberto, o tu che adoro"), Madame Patey (who was compelled to repeat Giordani's "Caro mio ben"), and Mr. Lloyd.

Wednesday morning was devoted to the performance of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," a work which, whether considered as an Oratorio or a sacred Drama, must ever command attention from the tuneful character of its solos, and the grandeur and boldness of writing displayed in many of the choral portions. That it never rises to sublimity may be freely admitted even by its greatest admirers, for Rossini's genius can scarcely be measured by his power of throwing, even into secular subjects, that depth of feeling which alone can place a composer in the highest rank of his art. But his knowledge of vocal effect, his almost inexhaustible wealth of melody, and his picturesque and often vigorous instrumentation, appeal at once to an audience not too exacting in its requirements; and the reception of the work at Exeter Hall on its recent production by the Sacred Harmonic Society sufficiently proves that such music, whatever may be the text to which it is wedded, will not be allowed to die. On the present occasion the parts were thus distributed—Madame Sherrington (Anais), Miss Anna Williams (Sinais), Madame Trebelli (Zillah), Mr. E. Lloyd (Amenophis), Mr. Cummings (Aaron), Mr. Santley (Moses), Herr Henschel (Pharaoh), and Mr. Bridson (Osiris), Mr. Wallace Wells assisting in some of the concerted music. How these vocalists sang the solo music assigned to them it is almost needless to say; but it should be mentioned that, although applause was strictly forbidden, the Duet, "Oh, fate, how tell my sorrow" (Amenophis and Pharaoh), the Quartett with Chorus, "My heart sinks within me" (Anais, Sinais, Amenophis, and Aaron), and the well-known Prayer created a marked impression. The chorus-singing was throughout remarkable for precision, vigour, and beauty of tone, the great Finales especially being given with much effect, the conducting of Sir Michael Costa, who is always thoroughly at home in Rossini's music, being beyond all praise.

The Evening Concert commenced with a fine performance of Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7. Amongst the vocal pieces in the first part which produced most effect were Madame Gerster's brilliant rendering of Bellini's "Ah, non credea" (encored), Mr. Maas's "Céleste Aïda" (which, although an ill-chosen piece for a first appearance in Birmingham, was well received), Madame Patey's "Che faro," and A. R. Gaul's Part-song "The Silent Land," which was so finely sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Stockley (who was received with that enthusiasm fully warranted by his admirable services as choirmaster), as to make us regret that more unaccompanied part-music had not been included in the programmes. The second part opened with a "Concert Overture," written expressly for the Festival by Dr. Heap. We need scarcely say that the word "Overture" for a piece of this nature conveys no definite idea to the audience, inasmuch as it implies that it is preliminary to something. True it is that Mendelssohn has used the term; but where he has written merely a concert-piece under this name it is invariably descriptive, as, for example, "The Isles of Fingal," "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," &c. Dr. Heap gives us no key of this kind, and we are therefore compelled to regard his "Concert Overture" as abstract music. Being a "Mendelssohn scholar" it is unnecessary to record his perfect success as a master of instrumentation and of all the scholastic forms with which an earnest pupil must become acquainted during his course of study. But here our praise must end; for although his themes are, as a rule, well-marked and graceful, they are not agreeable enough to be welcomed on their reappearance. His treatment of the subjects is, however, extremely good, especial commendation being deserved for a pedal-point in the latter part of the composition, and for a clever and animated Coda. Dr. Heap, who conducted his work, received the warmest applause on his retirement from the orchestra. The vocalists in the second part, in addition to those already named, were Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Herr Henschel, the latter artist singing the solo, with Chorus, "Where the pine-trees wave," from Schumann's "Faust," not, however, in a style to reveal its innate beauties.

Of the performance of the "Messiah" on Thursday morning little need be said, as far as the choralists are concerned, for we could scarcely name a chorus which was not faultlessly sung throughout. Mr. Maas, who gave the whole of the tenor solos, created a highly favourable impression; and if he occasionally forced his voice—more especially in the Air "Thou shalt break them"—it must be remembered that he had his effect to make, and that in the solo just mentioned the high A must be given in accordance with custom, if not in accordance with the spirit of Handel. The other principal parts were sung by Madame Sherrington, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Mr. Santley, and Herr Henschel.

At the Miscellaneous Concert in the evening—which commenced with Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and included in the first part a perfect rendering of Pinsuti's Part-song "The sea hath its pearls," conducted by Mr. Stockley—the principal attraction was M. Saint-Saëns's Cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the only work of importance composed for the Festival. Victor Hugo's highly poetical verses have been rendered into most unpoetical English by Messrs. Sydney M. Samuel and James Donzel; but as M. Saint-Saëns of course composed the music to the original French words, we trust that those amongst the audience who followed the libretto glanced as little as possible at the translation. No subject can be better suited for musical colouring than the theme of the Lyre and the Harp—the former in persuasive tones inciting the young poet to taste the joys of the world, and the latter to devote himself to the higher duties of religion; and had the composer approached his task with as distinct an individuality of style as the poet has displayed throughout his beautiful Ode, a more solid success would have been the result. But M. Saint-Saëns, like too many composers of the present day, has not the courage to rely upon himself; and instead therefore of setting French music to French poetry, he has not only yielded himself to the seductive theories of Richard Wagner, but has in some places imitated his imitator, Gounod. Let us at once say, however, that in spite of this serious artistic defect, he has produced a work which on the whole is worthy of the occasion. Dismissing all speculation as to when we are listening to Saint-Saëns, when to Wagner, and when to Gounod, we find in many movements excellent and most appropriate music. The theme in E flat minor (the Harp), with which the Cantata opens, is tuneful, and well contrasted with the second subject (the Lyre), which first appears in B flat major—the former being appropriately ushered in with the organ, and the latter on a tremolo accompaniment principally with the strings. The opening Chorus has a prominent harp accompaniment, and contains some good choral writing. After a contralto solo, based on the Harp theme, an effective Chorus occurs with some clever instrumentation; but the mild fugue which is introduced in the course of it is scarcely in accordance with the words it is presumed to illustrate. The next number contains brief contralto and bass solos of little interest; and this leads to a Chorus, with a long introduction, à la Wagner, in which the theme of the Lyre peeps through the mist just sufficiently to be recognised. The orchestra, however, is well combined with the voices in this chorus, and, notwithstanding some rather disappointing fugal writing, it proved, on the whole, one of the most effective pieces in the work. The following tenor solo and Chorus, which concludes the first part, is appropriately religious in character, the theme for the tenor, introduced by the organ, showing that here the composer has at least thrown his feeling, rather than his knowledge, into the work. The Chorus, too, commencing with a marked phrase for sopranos and tenors, forms an effective accompaniment, the sopranos doubling the principal voice part an octave above. There is much good writing in the soprano solo, which opens the second part; although, as the composer has resisted the temptation to represent the Lyre and the Harp by the respective instruments, it is a pity that he should imitate the cooing of the dove by a chromatic passage on the flute, so often repeated as to become even ludicrous. The following two Duets, the first for soprano and contralto (the Lyre) with female Chorus, and the second for contralto and tenor (the Harp), are certainly the most telling, although perhaps not musically the best, in the Cantata. The latter contains a charming orchestral figure cleverly woven in with the voice parts and dying off with much effect in the closing symphony. The baritone solo, representing the seductive voice of the Lyre, is well expressive of the text; and the succeeding Quartett, where the Harp again urges the claims of religion, appropriately introduces the phrases of the opening symphony. The final Chorus is brief, but expressive in every phrase, a point of much interest being the introduction of the Harp theme in the accompaniment, augmented and for the first time in the major key, as if suggestive of the triumph of the better voice in the end. Whether this work will live, suggestive as it is of the composer's transition state, we cannot positively say; for public taste is eccentric, and eccentric people very often make pets of what others would avoid. That it is highly poetical, and that M. Saint-Saëns has well-earned his claim to a hearing for his Cantata in the metropolis we unhesitatingly affirm. We have criticised the work solely according to what we conceive its real place in art; and have now only to record the fact of its almost perfect performance, the solo parts having been excellently sustained by Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley; and of the applause received by the composer (who conducted his work) on his leaving the orchestra. The second part of the concert commenced with the Overture to "William Tell" (which was finely played and, as usual, encored), and vocal pieces contributed by Madame Gerster, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Lloyd, F. King, and Herr Henschel, Madame Gerster's "Shadow-song" from "Dinorah," being redemanded, and Madame Trebelli being compelled to repeat the popular "Habanera" from "Carmen."

On Friday morning the programme commenced with Cherubini's Requiem in C minor, No. 1. With the exception of Bach's St. Matthew "Passion Music," no more truly devotional sacred composition exists than this Requiem; and although it may perhaps by some be said that a funeral service is scarcely an appropriate work to select for a musical festival, as a tribute to the genius of a composer too much neglected in this country the choice reflected the utmost credit upon the committee. Considering that not a solo voice is heard throughout this sublime composition, it is marvellous how vividly the varied feelings are expressed, the four-part Chorus alone colouring the words with a fidelity which cannot but enforce their solemn signification, even to the most impassive listener. The orchestral accompaniments, too, used throughout with that reticence which is the surest evidence of consummate power, form so integral a portion of the work that it is impossible in any part to disconnect them; and even with a good pianoforte reduction of the score the composition therefore appeals to the ear as the pencil sketch of a great picture appeals to the eye. The "Agnus Dei" and "Dies Iræ" may be especially cited as masterpieces, the latter movement, indeed, being positively thrilling in the intensity and depth of its expression. The contrapuntal writing throughout the work flows with an ease which conceals the ripened skill of its author; and the fact of there being only one fugue—commencing on the words "Quam olim Abrahæ"—is a proof that the scholastic knowledge of the composer, profound as it was, is nowhere displayed at the expense of the due expression of the text. The performance of the work afforded ample evidence that the utmost care had been exercised in its preparation; but strangely enough, the intonation of the singers, especially of the tenors, was often flat; and indeed the whole choir showed very evident signs of weariness. The composition however, despite this drawback, created a deep impression upon every musical listener; and we sincerely hope that its presentation on this occasion will have the effect of drawing the attention of Choral Societies to its many merits. The Requiem was followed by Schubert's "Salve Regina," for soprano and orchestra, Madame Gerster singing the solo with much earnestness and religious feeling. This work, marked Opus 47, was evidently written before the composer had formed a style of his own; but it is melodious and sympathetic with the words, the instrumental accompaniments being appropriately placid throughout. Sir Michael Costa's Offertorium "Date Sonitum," which closed the first part of the programme—a solo for baritone (with orchestra) and Chorus, although thoroughly operatic in feeling, is cleverly written both for the voices and instruments. It is, we understand, one of the composer's early efforts, and has been heard many years ago at Birmingham. On the present occasion the solo part being sung by Mr. Santley, the work, we need scarcely say, was presented under every possible advantage. The second part of the morning's programme was devoted to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which both by band and chorus was excellently given, the tendency to flatness in the choir being no longer perceptible: indeed we have rarely, if ever, heard the choruses more finely sung. The solo parts were entrusted to Mesdames Sherrington and Trebelli and Mr. Lloyd, all of whom were highly successful. We had hoped that Lord Norton, the President of the Festival, would not insist upon his absurd right of encoring any piece he pleased, but a wave of his programme after the Duet "I waited for the Lord," convinced us of our error; and, to the utter detriment of the effect of the entire work, this one number was repeated. How long will it be before this custom, so utterly opposed to the feeling of the day, is abolished?

Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was well chosen to terminate the Festival on Friday evening, although perhaps the satisfaction at such a choice might be more felt by the audience than by the singers, who must have found it a severe task to attack so exacting a choral Oratorio after a week's really hard work. Scarcely any sign of fatigue, however, was apparent, even in those choruses demanding the greatest power; and the result was in the highest degree successful. The principal vocalists were Mesdames Sherrington and Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Herr Henschel, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom sang as freshly as if they had just commenced their work, Mr. Rigby, especially, creating quite an enthusiasm by his excellent delivery of the Air "The enemy said." The National Anthem, which inaugurated the performance on Tuesday morning, formed an appropriate choral farewell to the large audience assembled; and then, after a warm and thoroughly deserved tribute of applause to the Conductor, Sir Michael Costa, the Festival of 1879 concluded. We have already alluded to the invaluable exertions of Mr. Stockley in training the choir to its arduous duties; and with a word of praise to Mr. Stimpson for his important services at the organ, and a recognition of the courtesy and devotion of the Stewards to their self-imposed duties, we bring our records of the performances to a close.

The pecuniary results of the Festival have, we are sorry to say, scarcely been as satisfactory as could have been wished, the receipts being only £11,729 11s.; but as the accounts were not made up at the time of our going to press, we cannot state the exact sum which will be given to the Hospital. We have already said that the general commercial depression may of course have had some share in producing this effect; but it would serve no good purpose to disguise the fact that there are some other circumstances which, in spite of their being sanctified by time, may perhaps in the present day act somewhat detrimentally upon the welfare of these meetings. We have much faith in the energy and hearty goodwill which has ever been shown by the promoters of the Festivals; but as it is conceded that musical men are not good in discussing business matters, may it not be equally admitted that business men are not good in discussing musical matters? and are we not right, therefore, in inferring that an artistic committee—or at least one with an artistic element—appointed by ballot, would draw up a better programme, both of untried and tried works, than could possibly be devised by persons who, with every good intention, have not the knowledge necessary for the performance of such a duty? We are convinced that those who have the best interests of the Hospital at heart would be too glad to delegate their power to others if they believed that a better result could be obtained; and as we feel strongly, therefore we speak strongly on the subject, knowing that, whether our advice be acted upon in the future or not, we shall at least be credited with an earnest desire to benefit an undertaking which has already done so much to encourage musical progress in this country.

The unexampled success of the Worcester Festival, last year, has given an impetus to the long-established meetings of the Three Choirs which will no doubt tend firmly to secure their permanence; for so practical an answer to the objections raised against their continuance is of more real benefit to the cause than the most eloquent advocacy of their claims, either written or spoken. We have always been of opinion that a slight concession to the opposing party is infinitely better than persistent antagonism; and as the introduction of prayer before the performance of the sacred works in the Cathedral, at the last Festival, so effectually satisfied the scruples of the clerical authorities, we are glad to find that at the meeting at Hereford this year the same custom was rigidly observed, more especially as the demeanour of the listeners seemed to prove that to the majority, at least, such ceremony materially deepened the effect of the music which followed. The programme of the Hereford Festival for the present year, although containing no positive novelty, was well selected, most of the compositions being not only of the highest order, but admirably calculated for the occasion, the rendering of these grand works in a Cathedral, as we have always maintained, being one of the main attractions of the Three Choir Festivals. On the opening day, the 9th ult., the Oratorio performance was preceded by a full choral service, the important points in which, musically speaking, were a Te Deum and Benedictus, in E flat, by Sir Herbert Oakeley, and Dr. S. S. Wesley's Anthem, "O Lord, Thou art my God." The smooth and scholarly writing in the Te Deum and Benedictus sufficiently evidences that the composer has based his style upon good models; but the noble Anthem of Dr. Wesley reveals the mind of one of the most earnest and gifted of our ecclesiastical writers, our only regret being that such music should form a portion of the Cathedral service in the early morning only. The rich accompaniments were, however, sufficiently well played by Mr. C. H. Lloyd on the still uncompleted Cathedral organ to enable the listeners to feel how grand would have been the effect had it been heard with a full band. Both the works named were well rendered; and the sermon, preached by Canon Sidney Lidderdale Smith, was an eloquent appeal on behalf of the objects of the Festival. The performance of "Elijah" commenced at the Cathedral at 1 o'clock; and here as we could not help thinking, so we cannot help speaking, of the late lamented organist of the Cathedral, Mr. Townshend Smith, a tribute to whose memory is due from those who, like ourselves, knew his untiring zeal and devotion to the cause of the Festivals, and his large-hearted sympathy with the many artists assembled, all of whom would willingly at any moment smooth over any difficulties which he might encounter by, if necessary, an extra amount of professional exertions. Mr. Langdon Colborne, his successor, evidently felt that in assuming the bâton on the first morning of the Festival he revived the recollections to which we have given utterance; for with some trepidation and a wise reliance upon the experience of those over whom he was placed, he endeavoured to earn, rather than to force, his position, and eventually succeeded in fairly gaining the good opinion both of artists and auditors. The performance of "Elijah" was entitled to almost unqualified praise. Madame Albani (who appeared before the public for the first time after her long retirement) exerted herself with the utmost success in the Air "Hear ye, Israel;" and Mr. Barton McGuckin, who shared the tenor music with Mr. Cummings, created a good effect with the pathetic solo "If with all your hearts," although he would have pleased musical listeners better had he not strained his voice and unduly dwelt upon his "best notes." The other solo parts were sustained by Mr. Santley (who sang the music of the Prophet throughout infinitely better than at Birmingham), Miss Anna Williams, Miss De Fonblanque, Mesdames Enriquez and Patey, and Mr. W. H. Cummings, Messrs. Fredericks and Chadwick and the Revs. W. D. V. Duncombe and J. H. Lambert contributing valuable aid in some of the concerted music. The choruses were given with excellent precision and effect.

The Secular Concert at the Shire Hall in the evening contained two important instrumental items—the Overture to "Der Freischütz" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," both of which were listened to with marked attention. Mr. H. C. Cooper, who attempted the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, was, we were informed, an excellent performer twenty years ago; all we can say therefore is that we are sorry we did not then hear him. The vocal pieces included a fine performance of Mozart's "Mia speranza" by Miss Thursby, Beethoven's Scena "Ah, perfido" earnestly given by Miss Anna Williams, Donizetti's "O mio Fernando," in which Miss De Fonblanque displayed a good voice and cultivated style, besides solos by Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Cummings (who deserves a word of hearty praise for his most intelligent rendering of Beethoven's "Adelaide"), and Mr. Thurley Beale. Mendelssohn's "Hunting song" was also given by the Bradford Choral Society with good emphasis and precision, but with less refinement than it deserves.

The Cathedral performance on Wednesday morning commenced with Purcell's Te Deum in D, composed in 1692 for St. Cecilia's Day. Unlike some of the "additional accompaniments" we could mention, those furnished by Dr. Boyce for this work are so thoroughly in sympathy with Purcell, that, as at its performance some years ago in St. Paul's Cathedral, we are not struck with the slightest feeling of incongruity, or even impressed with the desire to separate the original from the altered score. Supposing that we wished to impress a novice with the grandeur and power of our great English composer, we cannot say that we should select this Te Deum for the purpose; but it contains some noble thoughts; and considering how largely Handel was influenced by the composition, its value in the history of sacred art can scarcely be doubted. The solo parts were excellently sung by Miss Thursby, Miss De Fonblanque, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Thurley Beale, the last-named artist especially distinguishing himself. All the choruses were most impressively given, the fine choral Finale, "O Lord, in Thee have I trusted," being particularly deserving of praise. The Te Deum was followed by the first and second parts of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," as it is termed, although it is obvious not only that the word "Oratorio" wrongly defines its construction, but that the composer never intended the whole of the six parts to be heard at one sitting. Portions of this composition are however veritable gems, the least interesting—with some few exceptions, such as "Prepare thyself, Zion," and "Sleep, my beloved"—being the solos. The exquisitely harmonised chorals, however, and most of the choruses, must ever hold high rank amongst the composer's works. As the solos were entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, we need scarcely say how finely they were rendered. Commencing with Handel's Overture to "Esther," the second part of the morning's programme contained Spohr's setting of the 84th Psalm, "How lovely are Thy dwellings"—the solo parts by Miss Anna Williams (who gave the Air "My soul doth long" with exquisite feeling), Madame Enriquez, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Thurley Beale—Mozart's fine Fugue, "Pignus futuræ," from the Litany in B flat (preceded by the slow movement), and Handel's "Zadock the Priest," the choral singing in the last-named work especially being remarkably striking, not only for decision, but for perfect balance of tone; enhanced effect being gained in the performance of the work by the use of the excellent additional accompaniments by E. Silas.

A performance was given at the Cathedral in the evening, which was so well attended as to prove that sacred concerts in this brilliantly illuminated building are increasing in attraction, and that the idea—which originated with the late organist, Mr. Townshend Smith—is well worthy of consideration in other Cathedral towns where festivals are, or may be, held. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's setting of the 95th Psalm, "O come, let us worship," the same composer's well-known "Hear my Prayer," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The tenor solos in the first-named composition were finely rendered by Mr. Cummings, who gave a lesson to all desirous of singing sacred music with true and unexaggerated expression; and Miss Anna Williams and Miss De Fonblanque may also be congratulated on their success. The choruses too, were admirably given throughout. The rendering of the trying solo in "Hear my Prayer," by Miss Thursby, proved to us that she excels more in the florid operatic school of vocalisation than in the fervent expression of religious words; and although, therefore, she gave the notes with accuracy and earnestness, the composition failed to produce its usual effect. In the "Stabat Mater," the solos being intrusted to Miss Thursby, Miss De Fonblanque, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Santley, Rossini's charming and melodious music received every justice. Miss De Fonblanque in "Fac ut portem," Mr. Barton McGuckin in "Cujus animam," Miss Thursby in the florid air with chorus "Inflammatus," and Mr. Santley in "Pro peccatis," achieved a marked success; but the luscious secular strains of this composition were scarcely in harmony with the building in which they were heard; and we cannot but marvel why in a strictly sacred concert, with so many strictly sacred works to choose from, this one should have been selected.

The Cathedral performance on Thursday morning commenced with selections from Sullivan's Oratorio "The Light of the World," conducted by the composer. Our notice of this work on its production at the Birmingham Festival of 1873 prevents the necessity of now giving any analysis of its merits; nor indeed would it be fair to dwell upon the faulty manner in which much of the choral music was given on the present occasion, knowing the impossibility of securing sufficient rehearsals, in consequence of Mr. Sullivan's recent indisposition. Many of the choruses, however, were finely sung; and the solos by Miss Thursby, Madame Patey, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Santley, considering the difficulty of establishing a perfect understanding with the Conductor, were generally satisfactory. The clever Chorus of Children, "Hosanna to the Son of David," produced its usual effect; and the Overture to the second part—an excellent specimen of the composer's picturesque instrumentation—was admirably played. The morning's performance concluded with Haydn's Mass No. 3, in D minor, known as the "Imperial," the execution of which, both by the choral and solo vocalists, left nothing to be desired. Miss Anna Williams especially distinguished herself in the soprano music, which is throughout extremely difficult; and the other parts were filled by Madame Enriquez, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Thurley Beale.

The Evening Concert at the Shire Hall, which was conducted by Mr. Sullivan, attracted a large audience. The instrumental portion of the programme was extremely interesting, the first part commencing with Mendelssohn's Overture "The Hebrides," and the second with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the struggle for seats and the inevitable expostulations of the stewards, however, rendering much of the former work almost inaudible. Madame Albani's "Casta diva" and "Robin Adair"—both of which were finely sung—elicited, as might be expected, the warmest applause of the evening; but Beethoven's wondrous Symphony was listened to with respectful attention, and Mr. Weist Hill's clever Gavotte, for strings alone, (conducted by the composer) was received with the most enthusiastic marks of approbation. Mention, too, must be made of Miss Anna Williams's effective rendering of Weber's Scena "Softly sighs," of Miss Thursby's brilliant singing in Proch's Air with variations, "Deh torna mio bene," and of Mr. Cummings's unaffected delivery of a graceful song of his own composition, called "Two young lovers." The Bradford Choral Society, too, again evidenced the effect of careful and judicious training in the late Henry Smart's Part-song "Ave Maria."

No detailed notice of the performance of the "Messiah" in the Cathedral on Friday morning is necessary; but it is due to Mr. Barton McGuckin to record that he sang "Comfort ye" and "Every valley" better than any other sacred music with which he was intrusted during the Festival, his tendency, however, to gain effect by lengthening the expressive high notes seriously militating against his acceptance as a first-class oratorio singer. Of the other solo vocalists—Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Thurley Beale—we can only speak in terms of the highest admiration; the whole of the choral music, too, being given with a decision and power demanding unqualified praise.

The Festival concluded with a Chamber Concert in the evening at the Shire Hall. Haydn's Quartett in D minor, Op. 76, No. 2, was well played by Messrs. Weist Hill, G. Palmer, R. Blagrove and C. Ould; but Beethoven's Septett—which, from some unexplained cause, commenced with the "Tema con variazioni," in B flat major—was so shorn of its effect by the eccentric rendering of the first violin part by Mr. H. C. Cooper, that the audience failed to appreciate the beauty of the composition, which, however, was most ably supported by Mr. R. Blagrove (viola), Mr. H. Lazarus (clarionet), Mr. C. Harper (horn), Mr. C. Ould (violoncello), and Mr. White (double-bass). A feature in the concert was the refined and artistic rendering of the Andante from Spohr's 9th Violin Concerto, by Mr. Weist Hill, which received, as it deserved, the warmest applause. The vocalists were Miss De Fonblanque, Madame Patey and Mr. Cummings, the last-named artist creating such an effect with Purcell's quaint "Knotting song" as to elicit a double encore, to which he responded the second time by singing "Tom Bowling."

At the last Festival held in Hereford the receipts amounted to £1124 8s. 5d.; but this exceptionally large sum was realised in consequence of the civic demonstration against the resolution of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester to change the character of the Festival. This year, the agitation being calmed down, no such demonstration became necessary; and although so amicable a settlement of the question must be a matter of warm congratulation with all those friendly to these meetings, the collections of course cannot be expected to exceed the usual average. Stewards' contributions and dividends will no doubt make the sum to be handed over to the Charity above £1000; but the contributions taken at the Cathedral at this Festival, with sums since received, amount only to £868. Musically speaking, however, the meeting has been a very decided success. Mr. Langdon Colborne unassumingly discharged the arduous duties of his office; and if he did not venture any new readings of the standard works, he at least averted any catastrophe in ensuring the old ones. Mr. Done was careful and intelligent in all his organ accompaniments, and Mr. C. H. Lloyd, in those for the pianoforte at the secular concerts, proved himself an able and sympathetic artist. To the Rev. Berkeley L. S Stanhope, the honorary secretary, his courteous and ready assistant, Mr. W. J. Capner, and the Stewards generally, much of the success of the business portion of the meeting is undoubtedly owing; and personally must we here tender them our thanks for those many little acts of kindly attention which helped so materially to lighten our labours.

The prospectus of the twenty-fourth series of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts announces amongst the novelties to be produced, Hofmann's Symphony, "Frithjof;" Raff's Spring Symphony (No. 8, in A); Liszt's Symphonic Poem, No. 12, "The Ideal" (after Schiller); Wagner's Scenes from "Die Meistersinger" (as arranged for the concert-room by the composer); Verdi's Ballet Music, "The Four Seasons" (from "I Vespri Siciliani"), and Overture to "Aroldo"; Rubinstein's Symphonie Dramatique; Ponchielli's "Danza delle Ore" (from "La Gioconda"); Mancinelli's Overture and Selection from the Incidental Music to "Cleopatra"; Bazzini's Overture to "King Lear"; Forani's Concert-Overture, No. 1, in C; Berlioz's Selections from "Roméo et Juliette" and "La Damnation de Faust"; Gounod's "Procession Sacrée" and selection from the Ballet Music to "Polyeucte"; Delibe's "Cortége de Bacchus" and Divertissement from the Ballet "Sylvia"; Saint-Saëns' "Le Rouet d'Omphale"; Svendsen's "Carnival de Paris" and Rhapsodie Norvégienne, No. 4; and Dvórak's Slavonian Dances (second series). The first movement of an unfinished Violin Concerto by Beethoven—of which we have heard nothing until this announcement—is to be performed by Mr. Carrodus; and other works new at these concerts are also in the list, amongst the most welcome of which are Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and the same composer's Ballet Music to "Idomeneo"; Beethoven's nine, and Schumann's four, Symphonies are to be played in chronological order; and Mendelssohn's "Antigone" (with condensed reading) is to be given, the choral parts to be sung by Leslie's Choir, and the concert conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie. Haydn, Schubert, and Brahms are also represented; Schubert's birthday—January 31—being commemorated by a selection from his works. Amongst the compositions by our countrymen are the Prelude and Funeral March from Sterndale Bennett's "Ajax," a Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra by G. E. Davenport, a Scherzo by A. C. Mackenzie, a Concerto for Pianoforte by C. H. H. Parry, and an Instrumental Piece by each of the four composers who have held the Mendelssohn Scholarship, Messrs. Sullivan, Heap, Shakespeare and Corder. The boy violinist, Maurice Dengrement, who is said to be "but a little above twelve years of age," is to make his first appearance at the opening concert, on the 4th inst.; and if we may credit the laudatory notices which have appeared upon this juvenile artist, but small allowance need be made for his extreme youth. We are glad to find that Mr. August Manns retains the post which he has for many years so worthily filled as Conductor of these Concerts; and heartily congratulate the directors upon the excellent prospects of their coming musical season.

We extract the following from the Globe of the 24th ult.: "An experiment has been tried at the little town of Oswestry, in Shropshire, which is deserving of the success it has achieved. Under the auspices of Mr. Henry Leslie a musical festival has been held which is likely to raise the character of the music of the district, and to improve the taste of the public. For some months past selected voices have been trained in various centres in Shropshire and the neighbouring counties. The piece chosen for practice was Handel's 'Messiah,' and the united performance has taken place with great éclat at Oswestry, in the presence of a large assembly of lovers of music gathered from all parts of the West-Midland counties and North Wales. The prices of admission charged were sufficiently high to enable the managers to secure the services of solo singers from London and of an orchestra of the first quality, reinforced by only a few amateurs. The result is stated to have been most satisfactory, the choruses having been given with singular accuracy and delicacy, and yet with a power which could not be surpassed. It is true that many of the singers came from Wales, so that there was beforehand a certain guarantee of musical proficiency in the nationality of the performers. Oswestry itself is to all intents and purposes a Welsh town, although it is actually situated in Shropshire. But the real secret of the success of this humble imitation of Birmingham or Hereford lies in the fact of the town being able to boast of Mr. Henry Leslie as a neighbour. That famous conductor, with the enthusiasm for his art which distinguishes him whether he is conducting his own choir in St. James's Hall, or winning laurels in Paris, or training rough provincial voices, is always thorough in his work. There is the material for such a success as that attained at Oswestry in every English neighbourhood. Although, indeed, Mr. Leslie cannot be ubiquitous, there is no reason why the Oswestry experiment should not be carried out in all places in which music is appreciated. The materials are everywhere at hand, and a conductor could easily be found."

The following report has been forwarded to us for publication: "It will be in the recollection of those interested in the advancement of musical science, that in the course of the year 1878 it was announced that the Prince of Wales had placed himself at the head of an organisation having for its object the establishment of a representative Musical Institution, embracing in one body the most eminent practical musicians and the most influential patrons of music. It was proposed to seek co-operation and support from all musical societies of eminence, and to begin by inviting a union between the Royal Academy of Music and the National Training School for Music. An executive committee, with Prince Christian at its head, was formed to carry the scheme into effect, and at once proceeded to open negotiations with the Royal Academy and the National Training School. Both institutions accepted the principle of union, and appointed committees to consider the details. The whole of the year has been occupied in discussing the terms of union, which consist in effect in the acceptance of a charter uniting the two bodies; such an acceptance to be binding only in the event of there being secured, through the agency of the executive committee, an annual income of at least £3,000, with other advantages, for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of the new institution. The Duke of Edinburgh has recently communicated to Prince Christian the unanimous acceptance by the Training School of the terms of union. The charter has been elaborately discussed between the Royal Academy and Prince Christian's committee, and there remain only to be considered a few objections of little moment; but owing to the illness of Lord Dudley, the President of the Royal Academy, the final question has not yet been submitted to the Directors of that body as to whether they are prepared to become members of the new institution on the terms above mentioned."

The prospectus of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society announces that eight Subscription Concerts will be given during the coming season. The first public performance in London of two works of much interest—Goetz's Psalm "By the Waters" and Hiller's "Song of Victory"—is an important feature in the selection; and we are glad also to find that Verdi's "Requiem" is to be given, in conjunction with Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The other works promised in the prospectus are Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Elijah," and Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and "Messiah." The band and chorus, consisting of about 1,000 performers, will be on the same complete scale as heretofore; and under the able direction of Mr. Barnby. Engagements have been made, or are still pending, with the following eminent artists to appear during the season: Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Carina Clelland, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Madame Mary Cummings, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. E. Lloyd, Herr Henschel, Mr. Thurley Beale, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Signor Foli; Organist, Dr. Stainer. The season will commence on Thursday the 6th of November; and, besides the eight performances included in the subscription, it is intended to give additional concerts, if practicable.

The Borough of Hackney Choral Association has just issued its prospectus for the coming season. Four Concerts will, as usual, be given at Shoreditch Town Hall. The chief works announced are Mr. Prout's "Hereward," written for the Association, and produced last June at St. James's Hall, Handel's "Utrecht Jubilate," Schumann's "New Year's Song," Beethoven's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," Goetz's "Nœnia," Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," and Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm. Various symphonies, overtures, and miscellaneous vocal and instrumental pieces will also be included in the programmes, which show no falling off in the energy and enterprise which have characterised the Association during past seasons. Mr. Ebenezer Prout will continue to hold the post of Conductor.

The Liverpool Philharmonic Society's Subscription Concerts for the coming season commence on the 7th inst. The usual number of twelve concerts will be given, and the vocalists engaged are Miss Emma Thursby, Mdlle. Minnie Hauk, Miss Lilian Baily, Madame Mary Cummings, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Trebelli, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, Herr Henschel, Signor Brignoli and Mr. Carleton. The pianists are Mdlle. Janotha and Miss Kate Ockleston, and Signor Sarasate solo violinist. Among the works to be performed during the season are Handel's "Samson," Mendelssohn's "Christus" and "Athalie," Spohr's "Christian's Prayer," and Max Bruch's "Lay of the Bell," which will be given under the direction of the composer.

The prospectus of the Plymouth Vocal Association for the coming season announces three Subscription Concerts, with an extra performance of the "Messiah" at popular prices. The artists engaged for the first concert, on the 8th inst. (Haydn's "Creation"), are Miss Robertson, Mr. Henry Guy and Mr. Santley; for the second (Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis-Night" and H. Gadsby's Cantata "The Lord of the Isles"), Miss M. Davies, Miss Orridge, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Ludwig; and for the third (Benedict's "St. Peter"), Madame Osgood, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The orchestra will be complete in every department; and the concerts will be, as usual, under the able conductorship of Mr. Frederic N. Löhr.

An advertisement in our present number announces that the Committee of the "Glasgow Select Choir" offers a prize of Ten Guineas, for the best original Part-song for mixed voices; and we understand that this is the first of a proposed Annual Prize Competition, instituted with the hope of encouraging composers to give increased attention to this class of writing. The prospectus of this Association announces that for the appoaching season the services of Mr. Frederic Archer have been secured as Conductor of the concerts; and that, in addition to several new pieces of his composition, Part-songs by Messrs. Alfred Cellier, J. L. Hatton, Henry Leslie, Walter Macfarren, Ciro Pinsuti, and E. Silas, specially written for the Choir, will be produced.

The Annual Datchelar Festival Service was held on Friday the 12th ult., at St. Andrew's Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, when an address was given by the Rector, the newly consecrated Bishop of Bedford and Suffragan of London. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Faulkner Leigh. The service was Stainer in D. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," was charmingly sung, the solo part being taken by the leading chorister boy, James Ward, whose sympathetic voice and artistic singing showed the careful training he had received. Beethoven's "Hallelujah" brought the service to a close. The choir was considerably strengthened by voices from St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. Mrs. Stirling Bridge presided at the Organ, and performed Handel's Concerto in B flat.

With sincere regret we have to record the sudden death of Mr. G. T. Metzler, on the 1st ult., at the age of forty-four. For many years head of the well-known music publishing firm of Metzler and Co., in Great Marlborough Street, he succeeded in materially extending the business; and his artistic taste and literary acquirements brought him constantly in connection with many composers, for whom he wrote verses which are replete with poetical feeling, and many of which, aided by the music of Virginia Gabriel (Mrs. Marsh), Madame Sainton-Dolby, the late Henry Smart, Mr. J. L. Hatton, &c., have achieved much success. In private life Mr. Metzler was much esteemed, and his loss will be keenly felt by a large circle of intimate and sympathetic friends.

The Saturday Popular Organ Recitals, at Bow, were resumed on Saturday the 27th ult., for their sixth season. The managers of these interesting concerts deserve much credit for their endeavour to bring within the reach of the working classes the best music interpreted by some of our ablest organists. We understand that during the present month Dr. Spark, of Leeds, Dr. Peace, of Glasgow, and Mr. Samuel Reay, of Newark, will be amongst the performers. The admission is extremely moderate, and the programmes contain not only the words of the songs, but explanatory notes of the organ music, adding much to the interest of the Recitals.

Although the prospectus of the Monday Popular Concerts for the next season is not yet issued, we are informed that negotiations are in progress with Madame Schumann, and it is hoped that she will be induced to accept an engagement to perform at some of the concerts during the series. Mdlles. Janotha and Marie Krebs, Madame Montigny-Rémaury, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti will positively appear. The Monday Concerts commence on November 3 and end on March 22; the Saturday Concerts begin on November 8 and terminate on March 20.

Two Ballad Concerts, the first consisting exclusively of songs by English composers, with selections from the oratorios, are announced at Brighton by Mr. George Watts. For these the most eminent artists are engaged, including Miss Robertson, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. E. Lloyd, Signor Foli, Mr. Maybrick, &c.; Mr. Charles Hallé and Mons. E. De Paris, pianists; and Madame Norman-Néruda, solo violinist. The first concert takes place on the 21st inst., and the second on November 7.

Mr. Alfred J. Sutton announces three Subscription Concerts at the Masonic Hall, New Street, Birmingham, in the months of October and November, 1879, and April, 1880. The concerts already given by Mr. Sutton's choir have been eminently successful; and it is now intended to add chamber-music to the programmes, for the rendering of which the services of Mr. Nicholson (flute), Mr. G. Horton (oboe), Mr. Mann (horn), and Mr. Hutchins (bassoon), have been secured. Mr. Carrodus (violin) and Mr. Howell (violoncello) are also engaged.

The Islington Choral Society gave a performance of G. F. Root's sacred Cantata "Belshazzar's Feast" at the Windsor Street Chapel, Islington, on Thursday, the 25th ult., in aid of the Chapel fund. The principal vocalists were Miss Rosetta Tavender, Miss Steel, Miss Carpenter, Mr. A. Bird, Mr. G. Hibbard, Mr. W. Hibbard, and Mr. Hibbard. The Conductor was Mr. George Randal, the Organist Mr. William Henry Whitmore, and the Reader Mr. Tucker.

No prospectus has yet been issued of Mr. Charles Hallé's series of Concerts for the forthcoming season at Manchester; but the following particulars may be relied upon. The series will consist of twenty concerts, commencing on Thursday, the 30th inst., and continuing every succeeding Thursday till the conclusion of the season. The band will consist of eighty performers, with a choir of between two and three hundred. Twelve of the concerts will be orchestral.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Dr. Bridge, intends producing Henry Smart's Oratorio "Jacob" at the first concert in the coming season. The Society bids fair to attain a high position, as, besides a chorus of about 120, there is a very fair amateur band, which is to be judiciously strengthened by professional aid, both at rehearsals and concerts. The meetings will take place at the Athenæum, Highbury New Park.

Mr. William Lemare announces that the eleventh season of the Brixton Choral Society, of which he is the Conductor, will commence on the 6th inst. The works chosen for performance are Handel's "Jephtha," Spohr's "Calvary" (both with orchestral accompaniments), and the two new dramatic Cantatas, Henry Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles," and E. Prout's "Hereward."

Mr. William Harty, who has been appointed organist of Hillsborough Church, has been recently the recipient of an address and presentation from the members of the Dundalk Parish Church, in which he has acted as organist for a considerable time. The members of the Choral Class also gave Mr. Harty a silver-mounted bâton, as an expression of their regard.

We understand that Mr. W. H. Holmes, Organist of All Saints', South Lambeth, is about to form, for the practice of miscellaneous part-music, &c., the "Stockwell Musical Society," the meetings of which will be held at the Institute in connection with the above-named church in Priory Grove.

We have reason to know that the statement which appeared in a contemporary, that the decease of Mr. G. T. Metzler would "bring into the commercial market the extensive music publishing business carried on in Great Marlborough Street, under the name of Metzler and Co.," is without foundation.

The arrangements for the series of Concerts to be given during the coming season by the Glasgow Choral Union are not yet completed; but we have authority for saying that at the first concert, on December 9, Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," will be performed.

The Seventh Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of Thursday, November 6.

REVIEWS.

Musikalisches Conversations-Lexicon. Begründet von Hermann Mendel; fortgesetzt von Dr. August Reissmann. 11 Bände. (Musical Cyclopædia. Commenced by Hermann Mendel; continued by Dr. August Reissmann. 11 vols.) [Berlin: Robert Oppenheim.]

The wonderful industry of the Germans in the compilation of works involving multiplicity of detail is proverbial. There is no language in which are to be found so many cyclopædias of large dimensions (sometimes extending to forty or fifty volumes, or even more) on all possible subjects. The Teutonic race seems to be gifted with an especial power of patient work; and assuredly in musical literature nothing has previously appeared comparable with the volumes now under notice. The present dictionary has been nearly ten years in course of publication. It was commenced in the year 1870 by the late Hermann Mendel, who died in 1876, while the seventh volume was in the press. The publishers were fortunately able to secure the services of Dr. Reissmann, a musician of eminence, to fill the post of editor, and the publication was continued without intermission, and has been completed during the present year. A supplement, bringing the work down to this date, is now preparing.

It will give some idea of the extent of the dictionary, if we say that the eleven volumes contain 5,880 large octavo pages, and about 22,000 separate articles, varying in length from one or two lines to forty or fifty pages. So Herculean a labour as the preparation of a work of this magnitude necessarily required a large staff of contributors; and we find among the list of those who have assisted the editors many of the names of the most eminent theoretical and practical musicians of Germany. Among these are Messrs. C. Billert, Böhme, F. David, A. Dörffel, H. Dorn, G. Engel, M. Fürstenau, Gevaert, L. Hartmann, F. Hüffer, F. W. Jähns, W. Langhans, E. Mach, Naumann, Oscar Paul, E. F. Richter, W. H. Riehl, Th. Rode, H. Ruff, W. Rust, O. Tiersch, H. Zopff, and many others. Some of these names will be familiar to many of our readers.

It will not, of course, be expected that we shall have read through the whole of the 5,880 pages, which, as we have already said, the lexicon contains. Such a labour would overtask the energies of even the most conscientious reviewer. On the other hand, we can honestly claim to have made a tolerably thorough examination of the whole eleven volumes, and not to have contented ourselves with the summary process which has been described as "cutting open the book, and smelling the paper-knife." The first impression derived from a careful investigation of the contents is one of astonishment at its completeness. It cannot be said that there are neither omissions nor errors in it; it is inevitable that such should occur in a work of this magnitude, and we shall presently call attention to some that we have noted; but the general accuracy is worthy of the greatest commendation.

To give any adequate idea of such a work as the present would require far more space than is available in these columns. We shall therefore select a few representative subjects, and point out some of the characteristic features in the treatment of each. For this purpose, it will be convenient to divide the articles into four classes, biographical, historical, technical, and æsthetic and miscellaneous.

In the biographical department, the first article of importance is that on Auber, which is remarkable for the just appreciation shown of the composer's style. Here it may be remarked, in passing, that the whole of the articles on non-German musicians are written with a discrimination and a freedom from prejudice which contrast favourably with many criticisms from German pens. This is perhaps even more noticeable in the estimates of Italian musicians, with whose style Germans certainly have but little sympathy. As an example we quote the close of the article on Verdi (vol. xi., p. 16):—

> Some time must yet elapse before the prevailing prejudices against Italian music on the part of German musicians and critics are overcome—prejudices arising partly from the poverty of harmony, partly from the prevalence of dance-rhythms, even in situations where the German ear least expects them. True, Verdi as a contrapuntist will not compare with the German masters either of the past or the present—as in general the musical feeling of an Italian inclines to simplicity of harmonic treatment—yet he offers us ample amends for this deficiency in his deeply-felt melody and dramatically effective ensemble. Moreover the rhythm of Verdi's music is required by the national taste, which desires a more determinate and readily comprehensible rhythm, without at once conceiving it to be dance-music, as the German ear does. But if we resolve in German musical circles to take due account of this national difference of musical organisation, we shall meet Italian music in its latest development, as marked by Verdi, with greater sympathy than has hitherto been the case; and this truly not to the prejudice of German art, which, like that of all other nations, requires enlivening and exciting influence from without, that it may not fall into onesidedness (Einseitigkeit) and decay.

As only a few of the articles are signed, we cannot say who is the writer of these very just remarks; but we are sure that our readers will agree with us that the liberal spirit shown in them might be imitated with advantage even by some English writers on music. Einseitigkeit—i.e., sympathy with only one particular school—is unfortunately to be found in London no less than in Germany.

The biographies of the great masters are for the most part sufficiently full. We confess to some feeling of surprise at finding that, while eleven pages are devoted to the life of Handel, sixteen to Haydn, eight to Mendelssohn, and twelve each to Liszt and Weber, Mozart is dismissed in rather less than five. What is said is very good; but we cannot but think that a composer who exerted such an enormous influence on the art as the author of "Don Giovanni" might have received a larger share of attention. The older composers and theorists have a considerable amount of space devoted to them. We may instance as excellent articles those on Guido d'Arezzo (nine pages), Hucbald (six pages), and Zarlino (seven pages), among the theorists, and on Lully, Rameau, and Adrian Willaert. The biographies of living composers are in general admirable; the article on Richard Wagner is noteworthy for the judicial impartiality with which a subject is treated on which the greatest differences of opinion exist. In some of the earlier volumes will be found estimates of musicians of our day which perhaps scarcely do them justice, as, for instance, in the case of Brahms; but it is only fair to remember that several of his greatest works have been produced since the article was written. So again, the late Hermann Goetz is dismissed in three lines; which is to be accounted for by the fact that the article was written before the production of the "Taming of the Shrew," the work which first established the reputation of the composer. It is a curious thing, as indicating the relatively slight amount of knowledge on the Continent with regard to music in this country, that nearly all the mistakes we have noticed in the biographical portion of the work refer to Englishmen. Thus we are told that Arnold's edition of Handel is in vocal score, instead of in full score; that the Rev. C. J. Latrobe (whose birthplace, by the way, is given as "Fulnee" instead of "Fulneck") published a collection of sacred music in five volumes, the real number being six; that the late Earl of West*moor*land (sic) was called "John Jane." Similarly we read of "John Vall Callcott." In the biography of Thomas Attwood no mention is made of the fact that he was a pupil of Mozart. Some of the mistakes made are exceedingly comical. For instance, under the article "G. A. Macfarren," we find the following astounding statement: "When in 1875 a grand music school was founded in London under the highest patronage with the name of the 'New Royal Academy of Music,' Macfarren was appointed to the post of director." There is evidently a great confusion in the mind of the writer between the Royal Academy and the National Training School for Music. In the same article we read of the Professor's "son William." As the gentleman in question is described as "a clever pianist, and Professor at the older Royal Academy," it is evidently Mr. Walter Macfarren, the brother and not the son of George Alexander, that is referred to. No less amusing is the statement (vol. viii., p. 264) that Mr. Sims Reeves "retired entirely from public life in 1856"! Before leaving the biographical portion of the work, it will be as well to call attention to a few omissions which we have noticed. Of musicians (mostly natives of, or resident in England) whose names we might reasonably have expected to find are Sir John Goss, T. A. Walmisley, Dr. S. S. Wesley, E. J. Loder, John Hullah, Mr. Manns of the Crystal Palace, the late Signor Mongini, and Hans Richter, one of the greatest living conductors. Again, while the names of several librettists (such as Da Ponte, Ramler, Casimir and Germain Delavigne) are given, that of Eugène Scribe, perhaps the most distinguished of all, is not to be found. Some at least of these names will probably be included in the supplement.

A novel feature of the present dictionary is the series of articles, mostly very valuable, on national music. Many of these, such as the essays on Egyptian, Arabian, Assyrian, Chinese, Greek, Hebrew, and Indian music, are chiefly interesting from an antiquarian or ethnological point of view; but others, such as those on Bohemian, French, Italian, and Russian musical history, occupying from fifteen to thirty pages each, will be found of more practical utility. It is to be regretted that the article on the music of Great Britain was not entrusted to an Englishman. Herr Eberwein, the writer, has taken much pains in collecting his material, and the historical part of the article is in general correct enough, though we find one curious slip in the statement (vol. iv., p. 409) that "the so-called Commemorations of Handel took place annually since 1784, and even now exist under the name of Handel Festivals." As a matter of fact the Handel Commemorations were discontinued after the year 1791; and the Handel Festival is of course not (as would be implied from the above statement) annual. But it is in the concluding summary of the present condition of music in this country that we find the strangest statements. For instance, the list of recent or living distinguished composers is as follows: "George Perry, E. Murdie, John Hullah, Horsley, Onslow (who, by the way, was a Frenchman), Sterndale Bennett, H. H. Pierson, Macfarren, W. F. Taylor, Henry Smart, H. Leslie, Oakley, Cowen, Will. Callcott, Stephen Glover, Arthur Sullivan, G. A. Osborne, Barnby, H. Gadsby," &c., a list equally remarkable for some names which it does contain as for others that it omits. No less curious is the list of distinguished vocalists, which however is too long to quote. Four lady pianists are named—"Mrs. Anderson, Madame Dulcken, Madame Arabella Goddard, and Mdlle. Bondy"—only two of whom are English. Most comical of all, however, is the list of our leading conductors or, to speak more accurately, "music directors"—Messrs. Alfred Mellon, Dr. Wylde, Hullah, John Ella, G. Grove, and G. Mount. Surely there must be some fatality attending the best meant efforts of foreigners to do justice to the state of music in this country!

It is when we come to examine the technical portion of the present work that we find the most cause for admiration. In this respect the dictionary may be fairly said to be unique. Hardly anything seems to have been omitted; and many articles treat of their subjects in a really exhaustive manner. Such are the elaborate essays on Acoustics (48 pages), Consonance and Dissonance (42 pages), Harmoniesystem (32 pages), Intervallenlehre (26 pages), Organ (19 pages), Violin (20 pages), and many others of less extent. The articles on the various orchestral instruments give not merely a history, but in most cases an account of their mechanism and hints as to their use, which will be found of great value to the composer. In one instance an entire separate article, under the heading "Posaunensatz," is devoted to the proper method of writing for the trombones. An immense amount of miscellaneous information, much of which is difficult to obtain elsewhere, will be found in this department of the work.

No less interesting are the æsthetic articles, and those which, from inability to classify them, we may call miscellaneous. Among these are the papers on "Besetzung"—the composition of orchestras and military bands; "Direction"—the art of conducting (an admirable essay of twelve pages); "Pianofortestil," "Romantik," "Tonmalerei"—a most fascinating article on tone-painting; "Unterricht in der Musik" (teaching music), and others too numerous to mention. Our notice has already extended to such length that we have only space to refer to two highly characteristic articles—those on "Zeitschriften" and "Literatur"—as showing the enormous amount of labour expended in the preparation of the work. The former contains a nearly complete list of all the musical newspapers past and present of all languages. The titles are given of 155 different publications, with the names of the publishers, frequently also of the editors, and, in the case of many of the older and rarer journals, some account of their contents. The article "Literatur," which occupies forty-one pages, gives a list of all the more important works on music published in Germany, France, England, Italy, and even Spain, with the place and date of publication, the name of the publishers, except in the case of older works, and in some instances a short notice of the contents. The subject is divided into twenty-one heads, in the following manner:—

(1) Origin of Music. (2) Beauty and Use of Music. (3) Moral Effects of Music. (4) Physical Effects of Music. (5) General Musical History. (6) Music of the Hebrews. (7) Music of the Greeks and Romans. (8) Writings on Music in the Middle Ages. (9) Works on Modern Music. (This section, as also some of the following, give references to important articles in musical newspapers, as well as to separate books.) (10) Church Music. (11) Theatrical Music. (12) Military Music. (13) Biographies and Obituary Notices. (14) Dictionaries and Cyclopædias. (15) Æsthetical, Critical, Explanatory, Controversial, and Periodical. (16) Singing Methods and Instructions. (17) General Musical Instruction, Harmony and Composition. (18) History of Musical Instruments, and Methods for the same. (19) Acoustics; Physiology of the Voice. (20) Temperament, Keys, Rhythm, &c. (21) Miscellaneous.

This voluminous Catalogue is founded on C. F. Becker's "Systematisch-chronologische Darstellung der musikalischen Literatur;" but as that work was published as long ago as 1836, the labour of completing it by adding all the more important works issued during the last forty years must necessarily have been very heavy. The list, of course, does not pretend to be complete; but it contains a mass of information, which for purposes of reference is exceedingly valuable.

Though we have necessarily dealt in a most inadequate manner with the work before us, we believe that we have said enough to show that it is, in spite of inevitable omissions and errors, a dictionary which, as a whole, it would be difficult to overpraise. There is, we fear, no probability of an English translation being produced; the labour and the cost would alike prevent this. But every musician who can read German would do well to place the book upon the shelves of his library. It should be added that the price, considering both the quantity and the quality of the contents, is ridiculously low.

The Mechanism of Voice, Speech, and Taste (Throat and Tongue). By G. J. Witkowski, M.D., Membre de la Faculté de Médecine de Paris. Translated and edited by Lennox Browne, F.R.C.S.E. [Baillière, Tindall and Cox.]

Mr. Lennox Browne has materially added to the many services he has already rendered to the public in connection with the subjects of the throat and vocal organs by the translation of Professor Witkowski's work. The information contained in this treatise is made doubly valuable by an accompanying "Movable atlas, showing the positions of voice, speech, and taste, by means of superposed coloured plates," reference to these illustrations being made by letters. Regarding the various theories of the active agent in voice production, the author says, "Some attribute this important function to the air, others think that it devolves exclusively upon the vocal cords. The partisans of the latter hypothesis rest upon a pathological proof of great value, viz., that a lesion, however slight, of the mucous membrane of the vocal cords is sufficient to modify the purity of the voice. Yet Helmholtz seems to have demonstrated by the aid of the vibration microscope, that while complex sounds of the voice are due to the vibrations of the air, simple sounds are produced by vibrations of the vocal cords." However this may be, the treatment of these organs by experienced singing-masters has been much improved lately through the light of medical science; and we quite believe with the author of this work, that although we are now tolerably agreed to compare the vocal apparatus to a reed instrument, "it is well to consider the larynx as an instrument sui generis, the oldest, the simplest, and the most perfect which exists; nor is there any reason for seeking its analogue in any instrument with which we are acquainted." It is impossible to praise too highly the execution of the elaborate coloured plates in the "movable atlas" already referred to; although perhaps such praise would carry greater weight in a medical than a musical journal.

The Old Grenadier. Song. Words by Edward Oxenford. Music by A. C. Mackenzie. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Mackenzie is known as a song-writer chiefly by his thoughtful compositions in the style of the classical German Lied, but that is no reason why he should wholly refrain from works of a more popular character. A "people's song" need not be rubbish, though it so often is rubbish as to make the distinction difficult. It may have the characteristics of good music, such as truthful expression, melodic beauty, and elevation of style, in common with the properties that most attract attention from the many. If any doubt existed upon this point, we should refer for assurance to the song before us, which is the work both of a musician and of a writer for the people at large—a combination, by the way, most desirable in every case, and one, for many reasons, to be encouraged. The subject of Mr. Oxenford's verses is true to actual life, and this must at once explain and justify its sanguinary nature. Our grenadier belongs to the old fighting school, in which the graduates could never have enough of "punishment." He should have lived when wars went on for thirty years at a stretch, but even as it is he looks proudly back upon not a few agreeable experiences of wounds and death, and delights to shoulder his crutch and show how fields were won. "Hurrah," says he

for gun and sword
My friends till death they'll be.
Hurrah, once more, for the cannon's roar—
A soldier's life for me.

This is the burden of the old man's song, and it is not likely to be without its effect upon a fighting nation such as our own. We hardly need to point out what sort of music should be connected with verses like those from which we have quoted. It should suggest the measured tramp of armed men; reflect the boldness which banishes fear, and convey the exultation that accompanies the fierce rapture of the strife. All this Mr. Mackenzie's music does in no commonplace manner. The melody marches with a fine rhythmic swing. The accompanying harmonies, without being of the "vamped" order, are natural and effective, and the spirit of the words is reflected with the utmost nicety. We should add that the key is C minor (highest note E flat), the refrain being in the tonic major. Mr. Santley has added "The Old Grenadier" to his repertory, but even apart from this acknowledgment of its merit, the song cannot fail to win large approval.

Genrebilder. Six pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by Hermann Goetz. (Op. 13.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No long time has elapsed since we reviewed at some length the German edition of these charming tone-pictures, further acquaintance with which has enhanced rather than diminished the high opinion we were constrained to express at first sight. Music of the finest order is here—not easy to play therefore, nor such as can be grasped with a single effort, but music which, once mastered, becomes an abiding joy. The present edition possesses an advantage for English amateurs in that the verse forming the key to each "picture" is a translation and not a mere reprint of the German original. This lays bare to non-German readers what was in the mind of the composer, and gives a clue to expression such as could not possibly be arrived at by any other means. In all respects beside, the edition is a faithful transcript; and the publishers may again be congratulated upon the practical manner in which they have appreciated the worth of Hermann Goetz's music.

The Orpheus (New Series).
I loved a Lass. Love's good morrow. Merrily rolls the mill-stream on. Now night her dusky mantle folds. Four-Part Songs for Men's Voices. Composed by Samuel Reay. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The new series of the "Orpheus," containing part-songs for men's voices only, will be found a mine of wealth for vocal amateurs. One hundred and fifty-nine numbers are already published, including compositions by the most eminent modern writers. The four by Mr. Reay, recently issued, may be cited as amongst the best of this popular composer's works. No. 1, to some quaint verses by George Wither, has a well-marked and most appropriate theme, in A minor, the passage in the relative major—especially the emphatic syncopation in the bass, on the dominant, to the word "fool"—being highly effective. No. 2 is extremely melodious, and harmonised with skill and judgment throughout; the oft-repeated "Good-morrow" giving some opportunities for imitation, of which the composer has happily availed himself. No. 3, words by George Coleman, is an excellent setting of some simple verses, a good point being gained by the change from 6-8 to common time; and No. 4 is a regular English hunting song, full of the life such a stirring subject demands, and containing some effective responsive phrases for the various voices.

Six Pieces for the Organ. Composed by E. Silas. [Ashdown and Parry.]

The perusal of these pieces has given us real pleasure, so fresh and melodious are they. Mr. Silas always has something original to say, and he generally says it in a powerful and masterly manner. No. 1 is an Andante in G minor, based upon good and interesting subjects, excellently adapted for an opening Church Voluntary; while No. 2, which is a vigorous and well-developed March, would be equally suitable for the end of the service. The first part of No. 3—in A major—is built upon a short phrase of four bars, which, after considerable modulation, is brought to a conclusion in the key of the tonic. Then, rather unexpectedly, the movement proceeds in fugal form, and is based on a very melodious though rather long theme, which evidently has grown out of the first subject. No. 4 is a Pastorale in G major, and is a truly original and tolerably effective composition. No. 5, which is entitled "Meditation in a Cathedral," is a thoughtful and dignified work. Though marks of expression are scarce, it is plainly evident that Mr. Silas desires that this movement should display the character which belongs specially to the organ—that of a very extended crescendo. The last number, an Elegy in B flat minor, is, as its title explains, a very sombre movement, containing several exceptionally effective points. In fact, these pieces show that Mr. Silas is deserving of a place in the very first rank of composers for the organ.

Second Sonatina, for the Pianoforte. Intended as a preparation for the study of the Sonatas by the Great Masters. By Stephen Heller. [Forsyth Brothers.]

We are perfectly ready to accept this Sonatina by so eminent a writer as Stephen Heller entirely upon its own merits, and not as a preparation for Sonatas by other masters; for assuredly the smaller works of a composer will sufficiently introduce any student to his larger ones, not to dwell upon the fact of the Sonata before us being quite as difficult as many we could name by the "great masters" themselves. In the first movement we have some really excellent writing; and although the Scherzo is somewhat wanting in interest, the "Larghetto," headed "Feuillet d'Album," and "Finale" make ample amends. The last movement, indeed, is full of life; and played presto, as the composer has marked it, will require a nimble finger to give it due effect. A feeling of continuity is gained by a return to the theme of the first movement, ingeniously augmented, the character of the accompaniment being preserved throughout. The Sonata will be found a very valuable study both for the finger and the mind of the young pianist.

Miniatures, for the Pianoforte. Composed by Bruno Ramann. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

Although this collection of little sketches has an English title-page, the German name of each piece is given before the English, so that we have a right to infer that they were not first published in this country. How far the idea, so successfully carried out by Schumann, of telling little stories in pianoforte pieces, can be justified, is a question which cannot in this place be entered upon; but certainly the composer of these "Miniatures" has a right to a place amongst the many who have moulded their ideas in this form. No. 3, "Love's Message," and No. 4, "The Reply," may be cited as amongst the best of the numbers, the former, especially, being an extremely attractive piece in 4-8 rhythm, with an almost continuous triplet accompaniment. No. 6, too, "Silent Happiness," has a placid theme appropriately illustrating the title; several stretches in the left hand, however, somewhat detracting from the simplicity which should characterise so unpretentious a trifle.

The First Star. A Twilight Song. Words by Jetty Vogel.
The Maiden's Tryste. Song. Words by Jetty Vogel. Composed by Mary Hale. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Both these vocal pieces show that the composer has feeling for melody and an earnest desire to give due expression to the words. But we should counsel her not to begin a simple song in F and end it in D, as she has done in the first of the two before us. The "Maiden's Tryste" has an agreeable theme, and on the whole it is well harmonised. A few hints from a good master would, however, be serviceable to her; and meantime it would be well if she were to reconsider the second and third bars of the opening symphony, where the triad on the subdominant leaps on to the chord of the sixth on the leading-note. In the song the same melody is properly accompanied.

The Maiden at the Hostel. Song. Words by Fred. E. Weatherly. Music by Rosetta O'Leary Vinning. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

It is so common a fault to compose the first verse of a song, and allow the second to take its chance of fitting the music, that it is quite refreshing to find, as in the present instance, the poet and composer in sympathy throughout. We may presume that the persistent triplets at the commencement represent the steps of the hero's horse as he gallops away after quaffing "the cup she gave him"; and as he also gallops back again, to end this little tale of love happily, we can see why this figure so often recurs, and why these triplets become more rapid and more joyful towards the conclusion. This is in every respect a charming song, the poetical feeling of the music being as obvious as its refined and artistic treatment.

Peace. A Fable. Words by I. J. Innes Pocock. Set as a Glee for A.T.T.B. by J. Frederick Bridge, Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

To those who like humorous words and humorous music it is really refreshing when poet and composer unite to produce a glee so refined in character as the one before us. The fable is excellently told, and Dr. Bridge has thoroughly caught its meaning. Nothing can be more appropriate to the words than the sudden change in the character of the music to the phrase "The tears were standing in his eyes"; nothing more really comic than the treatment of the lines concluding with "The Wolf and Sheep have hired a farm, and the Dog dines with the Rat." We heartily commend this composition to all who can appreciate its merits and realise the intentions of the authors.

This is the Birthday of my Love. Part-song for Four Voices. Poetry by Sir J. Bland Burgess, A.D. 1790. Composed by Arthur Henry Brown. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Sir J. Burgess's excellent verses have received a sympathetic setting by Mr. Brown, who writes with evident freedom, and generally most carefully. We cannot however, reconcile ourselves to the two consecutive chords of the 6-4 between bars 11 and 12, page 3: the first should have been a chord of the 6th upon A. The change of key after the first pause is extremely happy; and the modulation into E minor on the words "Sing, little birds, above her head," is as unexpected as it is beautiful.

The Offertory Sentences. Set to music by Frederick Cambridge. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Good settings of the Offertory Sentences are few, though the words are peculiarly suitable for musical treatment. We therefore welcome Mr. Cambridge's music all the more heartily, especially as it shows that the composer has thoroughly entered into the poetic spirit of the text. Of course it would be altogether unreasonable to expect twenty short compositions to be of equal merit, but a melodious and suitable theme is to be found in each, and the work certainly deserves to be well known.

FOREIGN NOTES.

At the Berlin Opera the performances during last month have been, as usual, of a varied character although comprising no absolute novelty; among the principal works produced being Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète" and "Roberto il Diavolo," Marschner's "Hans Heiling," Wagner's "Der fliegende Holländer," "Rienzi," "Lohengrin," and "Tannhäuser," Weber's "Freischütz," and Brüll's "Das goldene Kreuz." First representations are, however, promised for the current season of Goldmark's "Königin von Saba," Nessler's already much-talked-of Opera "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln," and Heinrich Hofmann's "Aennchen von Tharau." Spontini's spectacular Opera "Olympia," which received a fragmentary revival during the late festivities in connection with the Imperial Golden Wedding, will also be produced, in its entirety, this winter. At the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theater the proposed first performance of a new operetta by Suppé, entitled "Boccaccio," has been looked forward to for some time with much curiosity. Berlin is also to have its Concerts Populaires during this winter; Herr Julius Liebig, the director of the Kur-Capelle, at Ems having announced his intention of giving a series of orchestral concerts in different parts of the capital. At the Hof Theater at Hanover the regular performances of Opera, under the energetic direction of Dr. Hans von Bülow, were resumed last month with Wagner's "Tannhaüser." During the recess the orchestral part of the house had been lowered after the Bayreuth model, an innovation which is generally pronounced entirely successful. Berlioz's Opera "Beatrice et Benedict" and Bizet's "Carmen" will be among the attractions of the Hanoverian season. The latter work, which has recently been most successfully mounted at the Vienna Opera, will shortly be introduced to German audiences generally, being already in course of preparation at the majority of the leading operatic establishments of the country.

Much activity is displayed at the Imperial Opera of Vienna in rehearsing and remounting Mozart's operatic works, the contemplated production of which, in chronological order, is regarded with much favour and interest by the music-loving inhabitants of the Austrian capital. The cyclus, while disregarding the earlier stage-works of the composer, will commence with "Idomeneo," which Opera has not been performed at Vienna since 1815, and will conclude with "La Clemenza di Tito," to be performed on January 27, the anniversary of the composer's birth. The series will be brought to a worthy termination with a performance of the "Requiem."

The newly-erected Hof Theater at Darmstadt, on the site of the building which was destroyed by fire some few years ago, will be inaugurated on the 5th inst. with a festive Prologue, to be followed by the performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin." The two following evenings will be devoted to Schiller's "Wallenstein" Trilogy. Wagner's "Meistersinger" is in active course of preparation, under the direction of Herr Schmidt, the able conductor of the orchestra.

The annual series of concerts at the Leipzig Gewandhaus will be resumed on the 9th inst.

Marchetti's Opera "Ruy Blas" has met with a very cool reception during its recent first performance at the Royal Opera at Dresden.

Herr Hermann Franke, the eminent violinist, has just completed a most successful concert tournée, in conjunction with the Viennese pianist, Herr Alfred Grünfeld, at various Austrian watering-places. The reception accorded to these artists has been throughout most enthusiastic, and the attraction exercised by their concerts on the public may be measured by the fact that they have also proved financially successful, while the reverse has been the case this season with all the other similar undertakings at the places referred to. The two virtuosi will continue their tournée in the leading musical centres of Germany.

The centenary of the foundation of the Theatre at Mannheim will be celebrated by festive performances between the days of the 7th and 9th inst., Mozart's "Zauberflöte" being included in the programme.

The Times says: "Byron's 'Manfred' has been performed at the Munich Hof Theater with Schumann's music, and the Allgemeine Zeitung declares it perfectly fitted for the stage. Herr Possart represented the hero in a style worthy to rank with his Nathan and Hamlet."

The Leipzig Signale says: "An interesting portrait of Mozart has recently been published by the eminent Munich photographer, Franz Hanfstängl. The original drawing was taken from life in 1787 by Doris Stock, and represents the composer's features with far less of the mild and childlike expression to which we have been accustomed. Energetic, exceedingly clever, and somewhat sharp is the expression of his face in this portrait."

Mr. H. A. L. Seligmann, an English tenor, will take a leading part in the solo portions of Haydn's "Seasons," to be performed this month by the Düsseldorf Musikverein, under the direction of Herr Julius Tausch.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie of Bruxelles reopened its doors for the present season of Opera on the 5th ult. with an excellent performance of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," the principal rôles being intrusted to Mesdames Fursch-Madier and Rebel (a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire), MM. Sylva (tenor), Devoyod (baritone), Gresse and Dauphin (basses). Meyerbeer's Opera has been succeeded by "La Dame Blanche" and "La Traviata" at the institution in question.

M. Vaucorbeil, the new Director of the Paris National Opéra, has made a great hit in the production of Auber's masterpiece, "La Muette de Portici." The Opera, which was revived on the 8th ult., had been banished from the Parisian operatic stage for many years on account of its revolutionary tendencies; its stirring melodies having, in fact, played a conspicuous part, together with the "Marseillaise" and "La Parisienne," during the Paris Revolution of 1830. There being no plausible reason why the Republic should dread the associations connected with Auber's strains, the revival of the Opera has been one of the first moves under the new régime, and "La Muette" has during the past few weeks almost entirely absorbed the répertoire of the Grand-Opéra, realising, on the average, 18,000 francs nightly, a sum which far exceeds the receipts hitherto reached by any other Opera produced by M. Vaucorbeil. The performances of the Opéra-Populaire at the Gaieté will shortly commence with Halévy's "Guido et Ginevra," and a new Operetta by Lacome, entitled "Pâques Fleuries" will be brought out by the Folies-Dramatiques.

M. Capoul, the French lyrical tenor, is about to quit the operatic stage of Europe, and will shortly proceed to America, at the head of a troupe of artists, for the purpose of performing popular French operettas at the leading towns of both the United States and the Southern parts of that continent.

M. Emile Sauret, the well-known violin-virtuoso, has, it is announced, permanently taken up his residence at Berlin, where his talent is much appreciated.

M. Halanzier, ex-director of the Paris Opéra, has been commissioned to reorganise the St. Petersburgh and Moscow Imperial Theatres.

The liquidation of the property left by Rossini having just terminated, the town of Pesaro will, under the testamentary directions of the composer, receive the magnificent sum of 1,796,912 francs, to be expended in the foundation of a music-school, which will be called the "Liceo Rossini."

Three candidates have been admitted this year to compete for the Belgian Grand Prix de Rome, which will be awarded for the best setting to music of a Cantata, entitled "Camoës," to which Professor von Droogenbroeck has written the words.

A new invention, affording security against the danger arising from fire, has been adopted by the Theatre at Carlsruhe, by means of which the entire stage may be flooded in an instant. The inventor is Herr Hang, of Augsburg.

The Berlin Echo severely criticises an article published in the latest issue of the Bayreuther Blätter, from the pen of Josef Rubinstein, and containing disparaging remarks on the compositions of Robert Schumann.

The article recently published by us on "Musical Instruction in German Schools," from the pen of Dr. Langhans, of Berlin, has, we understand, attracted some attention in Italy, and has been taken into consideration by the musical authorities of Turin with a view to the adoption of the system therein recommended.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik gives an interesting résumé of the musical activity displayed by the town of Chicago, from which it appears that during the twelve months from June, 1878, to June of the present year, no less than 347 concerts and 327 operatic performances have taken place there, the works of classical masters being represented in the majority.

A Correspondent writes to us from Turin: "On the 15th of August fêtes take place at the numerous shrines of the Madonna, and among the most notable this year was that held at Moretta, in Piedmont, the musical arrangements being under the direction of the Maestro Roberti, who contrived to collect about thirty-five performers, instrumental and vocal—a difficult feat at this dead season of the year. His Mass in E minor, composed during his residence in London, was listened to with the utmost enthusiasm, the same work having also been selected on that day for the Cathedral service at Besançon. We are in hopes of soon hearing this fine work sung as intended by the composer in one of the principal churches of Turin, if the Archbishop will but relax his prohibition, hitherto strongly maintained, of women's voices in churches."

In the general mourning occasioned throughout France by the death of Baron Taylor, the representatives of French musical art participate, having lost in him a most generous protector and benefactor. Taylor, who was of mixed English and Flemish extraction, had settled early in life in France, where he became a pupil of the artist Suve, and from the age of eighteen supported himself by drawing and critiques. He subsequently distinguished himself in military service under the First Empire and the Legitimist restoration which succeeded it. Having quitted the army, after obtaining the rank of Chief of Squadron, Taylor, in 1824, was appointed director of the Comédie-Française, his régime at that national institution being marked by the revival of Beaumarchais' "Mariage de Figaro" and the production of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" and Dumas' "Henri III." His later years were devoted to the foundation and support of benefit societies among artists and literary men, and it is in these his memory will be chiefly preserved by posterity. Baron Taylor died on the 7th ult. in his ninety-first year.

Gustave Roger, the once universally admired tenor singer, died at Paris on the 12th ult., at the age of sixty-four. Originally intended for the legal profession, his musical predilections soon caused him to enter the Paris Conservatoire, from which he emerged covered with distinctions, and soon after became a favourite on the lyrical stage. In 1848, Roger, then thirty-three years of age, was designated by Meyerbeer to create the titre-rôle of his "Prophète," the complete success of which finally established his reputation, while his subsequent continental travels secured him the admiration of European amateurs. In 1859 he was deprived of his right arm through a gun accident, and although for a time he succeeded wonderfully in hiding his defect, he soon after retired from the stage, devoting himself henceforth to teaching and the direction of vocal classes.

At Harzburg, in Brunswick, died in her fifty-seventh year, Henrietta Nissen, the Swedish singer, who married the Danish composer Saloman. A pupil of Garcia, she first appeared at the Théâtre des Italiens, in Paris, in 1839, and after a successful European tour settled at St. Petersburgh, where she trained a number of eminent singers.

At Freiburg died, on August 31, Carl Ecker, much esteemed in Germany as a composer of numerous quartetts for male voices.

The death is also announced, at Turin, of the composer Antonio Bertuzzi, at the age of fifty-nine.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Grünfeld (August 25): Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin (Schumann); Violin Concerto, Andante and Finale (Mendelssohn); Fantaisie-Caprice for Violin (Vieuxtemps); Pianoforte Solos (Bach, Mozart, Schumann, Raff, Chopin); Fantasia on Themes, by Wagner (Grünfeld).

CORRESPONDENCE.

ENGLISH AND FOREIGN CATHEDRAL SERVICES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have been present this morning at the High Mass at the cathedral of St. Stephen's in this city, where the immortal Josef Haydn was a chorister; and have had the great pleasure of hearing one of his compositions performed with an exquisite beauty and precision which certainly made a near approach to that absolute perfection which should characterise all our acts of worship, and at the attainment of which some of us humbly aim in the simpler services of our own church.

The choir consisted of not more than eight or ten boys, soprani and alti, and perhaps as many tenori and bassi; they were ranged in front of a gallery extending above the stalls on one side of the quire, Cantoris, as we should term it in most English Cathedrals (Decani at Ely); this gallery contains a small accompaniment-organ, and it is built out on brackets behind, or towards the aisle, so as to afford room for an orchestra, which consisted this morning of some twelve or fourteen strings, with the wood and brass necessary for the due rendering of the score. The whole service was very quietly conducted by a gentleman with a bâton, standing in the midst of the boys and close to the organ. As the interior of the noble church is somewhat dark, the gallery was furnished with rows of shaded lamps.

Before the Mass, and after it, a little anthem or hymn was sung by the boys only, tutti, with a truth and sweetness which I never heard excelled, and which I shall not easily or soon forget. The alti especially were quite free from the coarseness which so generally offends the ear in the choirs of Belgium, of France, and, it must be said, of Italy, once the land of song. The highest credit is due to the teacher of these boys, and if I thought it possible that this my letter could meet his eye, I should venture to offer him the humble tribute of my appreciation of his success. I may add that from my post of observation I detected no irreverence or inattention among his young pupils; there was no whispering during the intervals of silence, and all were careful to perform those little acts of devotion which belong to their ritual.

Sir, in asking you to admit this communication into your columns, I trust I shall not be suspected of approaching even the confines of those polemical controversies which distinguish or disfigure our own days. I write from a purely musical standpoint, and I may rely upon dispassionate readers if I ask whether we islanders may not wisely take some few hints from our continental friends in the management of the purely musical accessories of divine worship.

Our services are simpler, I have already admitted or implied. Nevertheless we have in England some twenty-five ancient cathedrals in which endowments exist, and are still applied, for the maintenance of a choral body consisting of boys and men equalling or exceeding in number those who sing in St. Stephen's. Twice every day throughout the year vocal compositions are performed at the ordinary morning and evening prayers, some of them of a highly elaborate character, occasionally for a double choir, or in eight parts, by no means simple. A German capellmeister, paying a visit, let us say, to an English cathedral organist, would probably form anything but a low opinion either of the matériel or of the répertoire at his friend's disposal.

But do we make the most of these resources? I fear that at this question the visitor would shake his head.

In the first place he would notice that as the Psalms are chanted antiphonally, we divide the choir into two equal parts or sides. He would see the necessity of this division in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalms, but I think he would advise us most strongly to mass our two choirs into one when the antiphonal music is over. We might not care to discuss with our foreign friend the many difficulties which our intense English conservatism interposes in the way of such a change, but he would have done a good work if, after his departure, we discussed them among ourselves with a view to overcoming them; and if this letter should contribute towards a full and careful consideration of this subject by church musicians of eminence and learning, I shall indeed very heartily rejoice. Much of the excellence of the vocal performance this morning at St. Stephen's was doubtless due to the position of the vocalists in a compact group clustered around their master. No wonder that les nuances were so delicately given, when boys and men were alike within the influence of the signs, perceptible by themselves alone, which an experienced conductor knows so well how to give. At home we augment greatly the difficulty of securing the accurate performance of arduous compositions by leaving the divided choir where it has been placed during the antiphonal Psalms, and by denying to it the immense advantage of a conductor. With us the conductor is at his organ, out of sight, often many feet above the pavement of the church, and several yards from the choir. That little boys should sing steadily and well under such circumstances, especially in solo passages, is to myself a matter for wonder. If all our larger anthems and all the greater modern settings of the Te Deum laudamus and the other noble hymns of the church could be sung by the choir grouped in the nave, or in the chancel east of the stalls, near to a small but adequate organ, played by an assistant, the whole conducted by the principal organist, standing among the singers and controlling the player, a vast improvement would be the result.

And then we should have room for an orchestra! Then we might hope that the enthusiasts, who are found in most cathedral cities, would bring together their violins, celli, and contrabassi, and diligently practise the orchestral church music which we already possess, and to which additions would doubtless soon be made by the unerring operation of the law of supply and demand; and every Sunday in the year, or at any rate on frequently recurring occasions, music might be reverently offered as an adornment of our worship in a form not less complete and entire than that which we deem essential in the pursuit of our own gratification.

One point more. I think the stranger from Vienna would criticise severely our retention of the falsetto voice. A solo, especially, by an adult counter-tenor, would be to him little short of abominable. This may, indeed, be a matter of taste; with those who so regard it, the old proverb bids us avoid disputation. But all, I think, must concede that we should greatly increase the power, and improve the balance, of our English choirs by throwing the whole strength of our men into the legitimate adult male parts, the tenor and bass, and by dividing the boys between the two upper parts. The change of system would not be unattended with formidable difficulties; much of the music which still holds its place in our services must be consigned to oblivion, or republished with extensive modification of inner parts; the choirmaster's work with the boys would at first be largely increased, and he must not shrink from the assiduous drilling of the youthful alti in the art of vocalisation from day to day and from year to year: but, let the change be once made, not in one cathedral only, but in all, not timidly and by way of experiment, but with bold and resolute decision founded on the deliberate advice of sound professional musicians, men who have at heart the progress of true musical art in England, and especially its consecration to the highest of all purposes—let the change be boldly made, I say, and in a very few years, when the peculiar effect of the falsetto voice, which has many admirers, has been forgotten in English churches, the authors of that change will be remembered with gratitude.—I am, Sir, your faithful servant, W. E. Dickson, Precentor of Ely.

Vienna, Sept. 7, 1879.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have attended another very noble service, with an augmented orchestra, including tromboni and timpani. Against this instrumental force, the handful of voices held their own wonderfully, the high notes of the boys, frequently including the B flat, being perfectly clear and free from harshness or effort. A soprano solo, with muted strings, was perfect. The young successor of Haydn, who sang it, probably possesses decided talent, but it was easy to see how implicitly he obeyed the slightest indications from the conductor, by whose side he stood. If the high standard of musical efficiency attained at St. Stephen's is chiefly due to this gentleman, palmam qui meruit ferat.

MUFFAT, GEORGE AND GOTTLIEB.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The September number of The Musical Times contains a notice of the recently published "Selections from the Versets of George Muffat," edited by Mr. N. S. Heineken, of Sidmouth. The musical world is much indebted to Mr. Heineken for his labour of love, and the extracts he has printed are most interesting and worthy of careful perusal, but they are erroneously attributed to George, being in truth the compositions of Gottlieb. Of the former we read in Burney's "History of Music," and it is only necessary to add to the information there given, that he was the father of Gottlieb, whom he instructed in the art of organ-playing and composition. When Gottlieb had made sufficient progress and attained considerable proficiency, his father placed him under the care of the celebrated Fux. His diligence and ability must have been very marked, for in the year 1727 the Emperor Charles V. gave him the appointment of court composer, and retained his services as musical instructor to the Princes and Princesses. In this same year he published seven Overtures under the title "Componimenti musicale per il cembalo."

My friend, Mr. Heineken, has permitted me to examine his manuscript volume of the "Muffat Versets," and therein I find an autograph note "Transcribed from the original by J. Groombridge, 1796." By a happy coincidence the original is in my own library; that it is the very one from which Groombridge made his manuscript copy it is impossible to doubt, containing, as it does, the autograph signature Jno. Groombridge. The transcript may have been made to present to some musical friend, or perhaps for the daily practice of Groombridge himself.

The original volume, now lying before me, is remarkable for the boldness and beauty of the engraving, being printed from copper-plates; it is an oblong quarto of eighty-eight pages, with a flowery and grandiloquent dedication followed by a preface which is so quaint that the following translation from the original German will be perused with interest:—

Kind reader, having studied for a long series of years to improve as much as possible in the art of organ-playing, under the direction of Mr. Jo. Jos. Fux, who without flattery is esteemed the greatest master in the world; I have suffered myself to be persuaded to tread in the footsteps of my father, the late Capell-Meister of Cardinal Lamberg (who in the year 1690 published a work consisting of Toccatas Chacones, etc., which is still in use), and to publish these trifles with the sincerest intention of being useful to the learned professor, and of satisfying the wishes of amateurs. Although I have composed a large number of galantry pieces, as they are called, which I intend to publish at some future time, yet I preferred first to devote these first-fruits of my diligence to the Supreme Being and his Divine service, this little work being particularly adapted for choral service and vespers, comprising twelve applicable tunes (tones), each of which contains one Toccata, six Versets or Fugues, making in the whole eighty-four pieces composed in a style of which but few specimens have as yet been printed. If the beginner should not have learned my method of fingering which is commonly observed by the best authors (performers), he will not repent having adopted it and leaving his former mode. I have frequently made use of transpositions * to convince the scholar that the upper part of the stave is so peculiar to the right hand and the under part of the stave to the left hand, that neither ought to cross the other. This great variety of transposition has prevented me from marking the pedals which every one ought to use in the longer notes. I have pointed out the various ways of performing the grace-marks by explanations at the end of the book, to enable performers to play the pieces with more spirit and elegance. Whatever may be the success of this undertaking of mine, I shall always remember that I, as well as my applauders or censurers, are but poor, erring and imperfect men; I have endeavoured to be useful, but not to make a show.—Farewell.

* The author refers here to the transposition of the C clef the position of which is constantly changed in both right and left-hand parts.

The last composition in the book, a Fuga Pastorella, ends on page 87, and is followed by the pious ascription "Omnia ad majorem Dei gloriam." Page 88 is devoted to the grace-marks or ornamentations referred to in the preface, and has the explanation of each fully written out in notation; this is a most valuable part of the book, giving a key to a large number of signs which by lapse of time have fallen into disuse. Curiously Mr. Groombridge omitted to make a copy of the page; possibly in 1796 such grace-marks had not become obsolete.

It only remains to add that Gottlieb Muffat printed and published his book in Vienna in January, 1726, just one year before he was so honourably distinguished from amongst his compeers by the Emperor Charles. Probably but few impressions of the work were printed: my own copy, the only one I have ever seen or heard of, is so sharp and brilliant that it must have been taken before the plates had become worn; and it is more valuable from the fact that the preface is dated in MS., probably by the composer himself.—Yours truly,

W. H. Cummings.

MOZART'S PIANO COMPOSITIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Kindly permit me to draw the attention of Mr. Statham, the writer of the article on the above subject in the current issue of your paper, to the following remarks by Ernst Pauer (a well-known authority), in his edition of Mozart, anent the variations upon Grétry's "Une fièvre brulante." Herr Pauer says: "These variations, although generally attributed to Mozart, and therefore included in this edition, are, according to letters from Mozart's widow (May 25 and June 25, 1799), not by her illustrious husband. The real composer is unknown."

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

September 11, 1879. W. J. S.

[Herr Pauer, in the quotation made by "W. J. S.," merely repeats the statement made in Köchel's "Catalogue," so that his "authority" hardly enters into the question. I am indebted to your correspondent for calling my attention to the fact, but I am by no means convinced that the work is spurious. The evidence on the subject is merely negative, and rests principally on the statement of Mozart's widow; and what is now known of her behaviour in the matter of the "Requiem" renders her word worth very little either in regard to critical judgment or truthfulness. On the other hand, many parts of the variations (the third especially, and the arpeggio passages of the last variation, which may be compared with a passage of a similar character in the Fantasia in C) are so like Mozart's workmanship, that if not his they must have been written with a deliberate attempt at forgery; and a man writing with this object would not have been likely to introduce a movement in so original a style, and so unlike Mozart's usual manner of pianoforte-writing, as the fourth variation (the one I quoted from), as this would have tended to defeat his own object.

The fact that Mozart had already written variations on a subject from one of Grétry's operas ("Les Mariages Samnites") would naturally have led to his trying other themes by the same composer; and Cipriani Potter, probably as good a judge of Mozart's style as any man could be, admitted the variations here referred to without any question. On the whole, therefore, and in the absence of any other claimant, I am inclined to consider that the composition is, at all events, more probably by Mozart than not, though of course I should not have laid so much stress on it in my article if I had been aware that the authorship had been disputed.—H. H. Statham.]

COPYRIGHT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I think it would be well if some definite statement could be made in your columns in regard to the use in churches of manuscript copies of copyright works.

However complicated the law of copyright may be in some respects, I cannot doubt that the habit which prevails in some cathedrals of copying, without permission, the vocal parts of copyright music for use during Divine Service is an infringement of the author's (or the publisher's) rights, and as such is liable to an action by law.

But this does not appear to be generally understood, and as I have lately been myself a loser by the practice of which I complain, I am induced to call your attention to the subject.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

F. E. Gladstone.

USE OF THE CHORD 6-4-3.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In reference to the 6-4-3 inversion of the chord of the Dominant Seventh, it is a mistake to suppose that this form of the chord was never used by Handel.

It is true that in some editions of his works the octave of the root is often inserted in this chord (in the pianoforte part) in cases in which it does not appear in the score; but positive instances of its use may be found in "Solomon," in the chorus "With pious heart" (No. 4), ninth bar, and the same occurs ten bars further on in a different key.

Other instances may be seen in "Israel in Egypt," in the "Hailstone" Chorus (in the third bar from the end of the voice parts), and in the final Chorus, eighteen bars from the end of the Oratorio.—Yours faithfully, Frenchay, Sept. 1, 1879. Charles R. Ward.

BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN D.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your last number, containing an "Analysis of Beethoven's Mass in D," it is stated (or perhaps rather left to be inferred) that the last performance took place at St. James's Hall, by Barnby's Choir. Please allow me to correct this, by saying that the great work was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, on the 25th of March, 1870, under the direction of Sir M. Costa: since then it has not, I believe, been heard. The error is not an important one, still it is better to be quite accurate.

Your obedient servant,

September 5, 1879. John W. Lawrance.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

H. Collingwood Banks.—Thanks for the extract, but we fear that the Preface only of this old and, no doubt, clever theoretical work would scarcely interest our readers.

H. Dale.—We cannot give advice upon such subjects.

Edward Roberts.—As our correspondent truly says, a man has a perfect right to place "any combination of the alphabet" after his name, if he feels so inclined; but it is by no means a profitable task to try to find out what the letters mean.

H. W. Cody.—We consider that when ordinary Anglican single or double chants are used to the Te Deum, the proper expression should be given by suitable changes in intensity, not in pace.

J. S. C.—Holmes's work, "A Ramble among the Musicians of Germany," can only be obtained second-hand. There is a life of Handel in English by Schœlcher.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Birmingham.—The Philharmonic Union commenced a fourth series of cheap concerts on Thursday evening, the 11th ult., when Mendelssohn's Elijah was given in the Town Hall before an overflowing audience. The efforts of this Society to bring the great masters before the people are surely, and by no means slowly, being crowned with success; this season, notwithstanding a slight increase in the subscription prices, showing an advance upon its predecessors. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Poole, Mr. C. Abercrombie, and Mr. D. Harrison, assisted in the concerted pieces by Mrs. Myers, Miss E. Bailey, Mr. C. Breese, and Mr. Shaw. There was a very good band of nearly forty performers, but the organ was not used. The work was very well rendered: Miss Mary Davies winning golden opinions by her rendering of the soprano music, especially the great Air, "Hear ye, Israel." Madame Poole was also very successful in her solos, and was greatly applauded for "O rest in the Lord," a similar token of appreciation greeting Mr. Abercrombie's singing of "Then shall the righteous." Mr. Harrison, as the Prophet, distinguished himself by a very careful performance throughout. The concerted pieces went well, "Lift thine eyes" being encored and repeated. The chorus-singing was generally very good, especially "He watching over Israel" and the "Baal" choruses. Dr. Heap's conducting was all that could be desired.

Bridgend.—On the 16th ult. a Concert was given in the Town Hall, the solo vocalists being Madame Edith Wynne, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The instrumentalists were Miss Bessie M. Waugh (pianist), Miss Lucy Leach, and Mr. John Thomas (harpists). Miss Bessie M. Waugh, besides playing solos, proved herself a most efficient accompanist. The hall was, as usual, crowded.

Bristol.—On Monday, the 22nd ult., the excellent series of Monday Popular Concerts, instituted by Mr. Riseley two seasons ago, were resumed at the Colston Hall. The band, as in previous years, consisted almost entirely of local musicians, many of them being amateurs, with the assistance of a few professors residing in the city and neigbourhood. It is, however, a matter for regret that, notwithstanding the attractions offered by an excellent selection of music, the attendance was by no means so large as on previous occasions. The programme consisted of the Overtures "Jubilee" (Weber), "Jessonda" (Spohr), and "Zampa" (Hérold), and the Concert Overture by Dr. Heap, composed for and performed with such success at the Festival at Birmingham. Dr. Heap himself conducted the performance of his work, and at the close received a very flattering ovation. The principal item in the programme was Sir W. S. Bennett's Symphony in G minor, Op. 43, which was finely played by the band, and elicited hearty applause. Boccherini's Minuetto in A major, for muted string orchestra, from his 5th Quintett, and the Gavotte from A. Thomas's Opera Mignon completed the orchestral works. Miss Alice Fripp and Mr. Percy Blandford were the vocalists, and Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band.

Cheltenham.—The Record of the "Cheltenham Musical Society," issued on the 1st ult., gives an interesting retrospect of the Association, which was formed about three years after the "Cheltenham Philharmonic" had been dissolved. At the concerts, which have been given after twelve rehearsals, and with an orchestra of thirty performers, many standard works have been excellently rendered; and we have no doubt that the appeal now made for "extra exertions on the part of all who are interested" in the welfare of the Society to obtain subscribers to its funds will be cheerfully responded to.——Mr. J. A. Matthews has issued the following programme for his tenth season of Oratorio Concerts: Rossini's Stabat Mater, Handel's Solomon and the Messiah, Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and Sir Michael Costa's Naaman. A glee and madrigal concert will also be given during the season.——At the close of the Horticultural Society's season, on the 17th ult., an Evening Concert was given by the orchestral band of the Royal Marine Artillery, conducted by Mr. Winterbottom. The solo vocalist was Mrs. Alfred Sutton, who was very successful in the songs allotted to her. Mr. von Holst presided most ably at the pianoforte, and in addition played two solos, which were warmly received.

Garlinge.—On Monday, the 1st ult., after evening prayer, the congregation was invited to remain and hear a Recital by Mr. H. Barnes, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, Paddington. The programme was selected from the classics of sacred and organ music proper, and the performance was duly appreciated. The offertory was given to the fund for completing the organ.

Liskeard.—A new Organ, built by Messrs. Maley, Young and Oldknow, St. Pancras, was opened on Friday, the 12th ult., in the Wesleyan Chapel, by Mr. A. C. Faull, of Plymouth. The programme was selected from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, A. Adam, L. Wely, H. Smart, Spohr, and E. Bunnett. The instrument contains ten stops on each manual and two on the pedal organ. Mr. Faull's programme was well arranged and admirably performed, being well calculated to display the merits of the instrument, which are of a very high order. In the evening selections from the Oratorios of Handel, Mendelssohn, and Macfarren were given by a choir of forty voices, Mr. Faull again presiding at the organ.

Lyndhurst.—With the assistance of Mr. C. Fletcher, an Amateur Concert was given at the School-house, on Saturday the 20th ult., in aid of a fund for the chancel pavement of St. Michael's Church. A feature of the concert was the brilliant playing of Miss C. Moseley (piano) and Mr. C. Fletcher (violin). The former contributed a selection from a Suite in G minor (Bach) and Andante and Rondo Capriccioso in E minor (Mendelssohn); and the latter an air with variations from the Kreutzer Sonata (Beethoven), accompanied by Miss Moseley, and Adagio and Rondo, encored (De Beriot), accompanied by Miss Burrard. The vocalists were Miss Baldock, the Revs. W. E. Coghlan, A. H. Gay, F. Girdlestone, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Bruce, Mrs. Hammick, and Miss E. Hillyer. The Lyndhurst Choral Society sang several part-songs, accompanied by Mrs. Macleay, under the direction of Mr. E. Hammick.

Maidstone.—The following works have been put in rehearsal by the Choral Society, to be given during the season: Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, Benedict's St. Peter, and Mendelssohn's Athalie. The Society has just issued its prospectus for the season, publishing the names of some sixty of the principal county families as patrons.

Martock.—The Organ in the Parish Church was recently reopened by Mr. Nosworthy, Organist, after being thoroughly repaired, revoiced, and two new stops—dulciana and gamba—added, at a cost of £65. The work was done by Mr. Allen, of Bristol. The organ is an old one, and was originally built for Wells Cathedral by Smith (or Schmidt), but the large size of the instrument and the smallness of the screen prevented it being erected in the cathedral, and it was purchased of the Chapter and placed in Martock Church. It stood in the west-end gallery, but when the church was restored in 1860 it was removed to the north transept, a plain frame being substituted for the large and elaborately carved case. The pipes and the principal parts of the organ were, however, carefully preserved, and form part of the present instrument.

New Southgate.—On the 18th ult., after the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of St. Paul's Vicarage, a choral service was held in the church, when selections from St. Paul and Beethoven's "Hallelujah" Chorus, were rendered by the choir in a highly satisfactory manner. Mr. Brion, A.R.A.M., conducted.

Newton Abbot.—Mr. G. O. Browne, late Organist of St. Paul's, and professor of music, on retiring from his professional duties in this town has been presented with handsome testimonials in acknowledgment of his services in promoting the cause of music in the town and neighbourhood during the past twenty-one years. A handsome marble clock, presented by the clergy of the parish, the choir, and other friends; a richly chased silver tankard and silver-mounted ebony bâton, presented by the Earl of Devon, friends, and pupils, were the principal gifts. These marks of grateful recognition of Mr. Browne's services are well-merited by the energy and talent he has always exerted in the cause of music, his able conductorship and diligent training of Choral Societies having always resulted in the good performance of first-class music.

Oldham.—The fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of St. James's Church was celebrated on Thursday, the 18th ult. There was holy communion at 10.30, and at 7.30 evening prayer with sermon. The opening voluntary was a Largo in D by Beethoven; during the offertory Dussek's "Andante Moderato," and at the conclusion Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major, were played. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Berthold Tours, and the Anthem, "It came even to pass," by Sir F. Ouseley Mr. Joseph Clafton presided at the organ, and the augmented choir consisted of about forty voices. The Vicar, Rev. T. L. Knapp, intoned the prayers, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F C. Woodhouse, M.A., Rector of St. Mary's, Hulme, Manchester. The offertory realised £15 4s., which was devoted to the fund for painting and decorating the church.

Victoria.—At the opening of the new sanctuary and magnificent marble altar at the church of St. Francis of Assisi, Lonsdale Street, a Grand Mass in D, by Mr. Austin Turner, of Ballarat, was performed, the vocalists and instrumentalists numbering nearly 100. The work is highly spoken of by the local press.

Wakefield.—On Tuesday evening, the 2nd ult., an Organ Recital was given on the instrument in Holy Trinity Church by Mr. William Blakeley (Assoc. College of Organists, London), of this town. The programme was an excellent and varied one, including Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue, Guilmant's Grand Chorus, Prelude and Fugue on the name of Bach, Andante from Quartett, Haydn; Fantasia in C major by Tours, Pastorale in G major by Gustave Merkel, and a Festive March by the late Henry Smart; also two Andantes by Batiste, all of which were excellently played. Mr. J. Moxon gave a good rendering of the Recitative and Air "If with all your hearts" (Elijah), and Master Bates, in Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," was very efficient. The choir sang two anthems, one by Mr Blakeley, "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength," the solos in which were well sung by Mr. Flower and Mr. Westwood. Barnby's anthem, "I will give thanks," brought to a close an interesting concert. A collection was made in aid of the Clayton Hospital.

Weybridge.—The members of the Colnbrook Choral Society held their annual pic-nic on the 10th ult. at St George's Hill, when a selection of glees and part-songs was performed by the members, under the direction of Mr. R. Ratcliff, the Conductor of the Society.

Worthing.—On Thursday, the 18th ult., Mr. L. S. Palmer gave a Concert in aid of the Widow and Children of Alfred Dean, the late coxswain of the Worthing Lifeboat. The artists were Madame Marie Rôze, Madame Zara O'Carrol, Signor Runcio, Mr. O'Carroll, Mr. A. H. Collet, Mr. F. D. Siebrit, a select choir, and a small orchestra. Madame Marie Rôze (who, with Signor Runcio, gave gratuitous aid, by the kind permission of Colonel Mapleson) sang no less than six times during the evening. Signor Runcio also met with the most hearty reception. The programme was an attractive one, including part-music, well sung by the choir, two overtures, and a selection from Carmen. A feature of the evening was Mr. Collet's cornet solo, "Leggiero invisibile." Mr. F. D. Siebrit played a piano solo of his own and presided at the instrument, Mr. L. S. Palmer conducting. The orchestra was decorated with oars crossed, and in the centre life-belts with the letters A. D. in white flowers. In the centre of the stage was the mast of the lifeboat, with the flags half-mast high. The gross receipts were over £70.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. John E. Fimister, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Shenley, near Barnet.—Mr. W. J. Hutchins to Belhaven Church, Glasgow.—Mr. C. E. Rowley, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Warrington.—Mr. Thomas Ransom Ling, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's, Winchmore Hill, N.—Mr. E. Burritt Lane, L. MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Now ready.

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

Carefully compiled from the best and most authentic Sources,

BY WM. POLE, F.R.S., MUS. DOC.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

THE EDITOR.

"Dr. Grove's Dictionary will be a boon to every intelligent lover of music."—Saturday Review.

"What is modestly called a 'Dictionary' might have fairly been entitled an 'Encyclopædia,' for the editor has included in his scheme everything that belongs to music, or is allied, or is even distantly related to it. It would be a great mistake to regard this work as useful only for the purposes of reference. It is a collection of interesting and valuable articles on all kinds of musical subjects, which amateurs, who take a genuine interest in the art they profess to love, will read from beginning to end."—Daily News.

"We now take leave of this 'Dictionary,' recommending it heartily to our readers as full of instruction and amusement."—Times.

"What will strike the reader first of all, perhaps, is the fulness and completeness of the information here collected."—Examiner.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorals and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

Pianoforte and Harmonium Accompaniments.

To obviate the difficulty experienced by such Country Choral Societies as are unable to procure the assistance of an orchestra for the performance of complete works, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. intend publishing an arrangement of the Orchestral Accompaniments of many popular works for Pianoforte and Harmonium. The accompaniments of the following works are now ready:—

STERNDALE BENNETT'S MAY QUEEN,
Arranged by J. Lemmens, folio, price 7s. 6d.

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER,
Arranged by J. Lemmens, folio, price 6s.

STAINER'S DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS,
Arranged by W. Hodge, price 5s.

MACFARREN'S MAY DAY,
Arranged by Windeyer Clark, price 5s.

IN THE PRESS.

MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH (E. Prout).

ORCHESTRAL PARTS.

Since the reduction in the price of music in 1849, by Mr. J. A. Novello, Choral Societies have so rapidly grown up and developed that works requiring full orchestral accompaniments are now, rather as a rule than an exception, included in their public performances. Hitherto, however, the price of band parts has been so high that, instead of purchasing, it has been the custom to hire them whenever a composition demanding such aid has been given. In order to obviate the necessity of this, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have decided that in future all Orchestral Parts shall be marked at the uniform rate of

SIXPENCE PER SHEET,

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875 & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE."

"A. FETIS,

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

ORCHESTRAL PARTS.

Since the reduction in the price of music in 1849, by Mr. J. A. Novello, Choral Societies have so rapidly grown up and developed that works requiring full orchestral accompaniments are now, rather as a rule than an exception, included in their public performances. Hitherto, however, the price of band parts has been so high that, instead of purchasing, it has been the custom to hire them whenever a composition demanding such aid has been given. In order to obviate the necessity of this, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have decided that in future all Orchestral Parts shall be marked at the uniform rate of

SIXPENCE PER SHEET,

thus enabling Institutions to form a permanent Library for the Orchestra, as well as for the Choir, at a small additional outlay.

WAGNER'S "WORK AND MISSION OF MY LIFE."

ALTHOUGH Herr Wagner, in the articles recently contributed to the North American Review, tells an old and familiar story, he has touched upon many points in a manner worthy of attention. Such a man cannot exactly repeat himself. His bold and original mind must necessarily assert its distinctive qualities whenever the pen is taken in hand, and to this rule the present case offers no exception. The reader's time will not be wasted, therefore, if he make with us an examination of the latest Bayreuthian utterance.

We are struck, first of all, by an elaborate glorification of the Germanic race, as it has developed out of Germany. Wagner draws a broad line between what is purely national and what is international in the Teutonic spirit. The distinction, by the way, is characteristic of him, since he has never concealed a contempt for the bulk of his countrymen, who, in his opinion, love darkness rather than light. Setting out thus, moreover, had the advantage of flattering the self-love of the vast community of Anglo-Saxons and emigrant Germans whom he addressed through the pages of a transatlantic serial. Here are his own words: "Certainly it is a true Germanic race that has gone forth from its English home and, continually recruited by emigrants from the mother country of Germany, is working out the future of America. It shows in this its old habit; it shows itself in its true strength and greatness on a foreign soil, thrown upon its own activity and energy, and compelled to build up a new self-sustaining community. On the other hand that part of the race which has remained in Germany, that part which bore the special distinctive name of Germans, and even in the old days stayed quietly at home, has always represented the peculiar type of the German Philistine. He lets himself be hampered and hemmed in on every side, and lives out his long tale of little woes in pettiness and wretchedness, amid continual bickerings with neighbours like himself." This is plain-speaking, but dexterous policy as regards the new audience addressed, whom it could not fail to put in good temper, while gratifying Herr Wagner himself after a fashion only to be conceived by those who enter into the feelings of a prophet surrounded by deaf ears and hard hearts. But while the stay-at-home Germans are the miserable creatures above described, they are capable of producing from time to time, as by a "mighty, miraculous birth," the great individual German—"the Great Man, standing alone in strange, majestic isolation, as only Germany has given him being, as she has brought him forth especially, to the amazement of the world, in the domain of Art—that art which otherwise has gained in Germany so small a footing." The mission of this "Great Man" is to stimulate and influence the vigorous Germanic spirit of those who have gone forth from the enervated fatherland. Living all his life as a stranger amid the hostility of his countrymen (even as Wagner himself), he appeals to "that old strain of German blood that runs through all the nations" (even as Wagner appeals in the North American Review). We cannot follow the writer through his detail of the causes that produced the actual corruption of Germany. Enough that he attributes the result to "the heterogeneous web of a civilisation foreign to the German race"—a web of two colours: first the sallow hue of an oligarchy of petty rulers, and next the red hue of the Revolution. These colours, and the textures to which they belonged were, we are told, blended by a third foreign constituent—the Jewish element in politics, society, and art. Such, according to Wagner, are the agencies that repress the German spirit at home, and foist upon the land of Goethe and Beethoven a civilisation foreign to and destructive of its genius. Yet it was not for want of leaders that the national spirit succumbed. Goethe and Beethoven lived at the time of the great uprising against Napoleonic domination. Weber sang his "pure and noble strains," Schiller laboured to create a national stage; and, if Herr Wagner may be credited, there was a time when German music succeeded in inspiring the lyric drama to a complete revival by breathing into it the breath of new life. Either through modesty, or some other cause, the writer refrains from telling us precisely when this crisis occurred, but he declares it to have been "the decisive moment when an intelligent support of native art, by a power as truly national, would have given the surest confirmation of the victory of German culture over foreign civilisation."

The above is a fair résumé of Wagner's argument, which, as it appears to us, has one great and characteristic fault. It is high-sounding and impressive to the ear, but offers only vague outlines to the mind's eye. Nothing can be easier than railing at a "foreign civilisation," but Herr Wagner forgets to tell us, with the precision of a practical man dealing in practical things, what a purely Germanic civilisation would be like. Misty utterances won't do in such a case. We demand something definite, and are offered but fine phrases. So in regard to the German art of which Herr Wagner is the self-appointed champion. But here it may be said that in his "Nibelungen Ring," Wagner has shown the ideal of at least one form of that national cultus. We readily admit the point, and are disposed rather to insist upon than reluctantly concede the representative character of the Bayreuth music-drama, since it explains the Philistinism of Germany as we would have it explained. Our Teutonic brethren are practical enough in their way, and refuse to worship an idol simply because it has been carved out of German wood, with German tools, by German hands. It is clear from this latest deliverance that Wagner continues, with distinctive obstinacy, to misunderstand his era. He does not see that ours is eminently a practical age. Some years have passed since the most Quixotic nation in Europe went to war for an idea, and that, we take it, was the last manifestation of a spirit which prompts men to imitate bulls and charge realities with their eyes shut. Herr Wagner will never obtain a following of other than weak visionaries if he restricts himself to phrase-making. He must formulate his measures in the precise language of a statute, and then the world will know exactly what he offers. His notion of the lyric drama we do know (and many of us reject it), but this is only one element in the Germanic civilisation which he should be prepared to set forth in minutest detail. Herr Wagner further mistakes the signs of the artistic times. He is witness, as we all are, to a revival of nationality in politics. Brethren long sundered by artificial barriers are stretching forth their arms one to another, and becoming, often through much tribulation, a family again. Looking upon this phenomenon from some distant hermitage, a recluse may be pardoned for supposing that the revival extends to everything national. But where are the signs of this result? Only the other day, it is true, a solemn determination was arrived at to "christen" German war-ships with Rhine wine instead of champagne, and we cheerfully cite the fact, enduring such discomfiture as it inflicts upon us. But as regards art, and above all the art of music, the tendency towards cosmopolitanism becomes more marked year by year. And this, pace Herr Wagner, is right. The music of any one country is but a plot in a beautiful garden, and should be regarded not for itself alone, but as contributing to and sharing in the glory of the whole. Indeed, apart from melodies characterised by scales and rhythms locally used, there is now no such thing as national music. Nation has acted upon nation, until—though the German element predominates by right of its superior genius—the universal art of music is, in its highest development, a compound of all excellence. Wherefore, assuming that Wagner could limit music in Germany to German music pure and simple, he would do his country's art an injury rather than a service. To his own genius he does despite even now, by wasting in local efforts that which was intended to serve the world.

After discussing the present condition of German art, Wagner proceeds to detail the experiences of his life. Over much of this narrative we can pass as being sufficiently well known, but points here and there call for notice. Thus we gather that Wagner in his "hot youth" began to imitate Beethoven and Weber before he had mastered the theory of music, and inevitable failure gave him a first intimation that, even in pursuing an ideal, some regard must be paid to realities. We learn also that his second Opera, founded on "Measure for Measure," was composed "in the French, and even in the Italian style," because in Bellini's "Romeo" Schroder-Devrient had shown what vigorous life a great artist could infuse into works even of that character. Wagner craved this vigorous life, and seems to have been far from particular how or whence it came; but meanwhile German music went, in his opinion, from bad to worse. Need it be said that he is at his best when describing the decadence, or that we see once more the athlete of "Opern und Drama." The "foreign, un-German element," he tells us, swept over the land. First came the "lively, sparkling compositions" of Auber and Rossini; and then followed Meyerbeer, "a man of peculiar talents," belonging to "the race of go-betweens," whose mission was to complete the estrangement of the Germans from an art peculiarly their own. Coarseness and triviality at once prevailed till Mendelssohn, also a member of the "ubiquitous, talented race" of go-betweens, came with his fine taste and real artistic ability. Here Wagner ventures to formulate the actual purpose of Mendelssohn, which was, we are told, "To lead the educated classes of Germany as far away from the dreaded and misunderstood extravagances of a Beethoven, and from the sublime prospect opened to national art by his later works, as from those rude theatrical orgies which his more refined taste so detested in the historical opera of his fellow-Hebrew." This is pretty well in the way of slashing false statement, but the impudent irony of what follows stands forth unapproached and unapproachable: "Amid all the tempests of revolution, he (Mendelssohn) gave to his art a delicate, smooth, quiet, and agreeably tranquil form that excited nobody, and had no aim but to please the modern cultivated taste and to give it occasionally, amid the shifting and turmoil of the times, the consolation of a little pleasing and elegant entertainment." And this man, the composer of "Elijah" and "St. Paul," the champion of Bach and Schubert, the writer of the Scotch Symphony and the "Hebrides" Overture was, after all, but a drawing-room entertainer, whose aims, we are further told, influenced the "feebly defined yet really earnest and meditative talent" of Robert Schumann to leave his "little spirited and pleasant songs and pieces for the pianoforte," in order to write symphonies, oratorios, and operas! One hardly knows whether to be angry at this insufferable insolence or amused at the lofty declaration, "I could not feel myself drawn towards such an art." What has the world lost by that insensibility? Who can tell? But had Wagner also composed symphonies and oratorios, we should know more than we do of the right by which he treats Mendelssohn and Schumann with irony and contempt. Besides, if Mendelssohn sought to draw the educated public away from the enigmatic Beethoven, Wagner should have exerted his energies in the opposite direction, instead of running off to Paris with a second-rate imitation of Meyerbeer in his pocket.

Up to the time when Wagner arrived in Paris and after, he had no very definite notions of a mission, nor was he under the sway of artistic principles. However much he may seek to hide the fact behind a cloud of words, he was simply bent upon "getting on," and not very particular by what means. According to his own showing, he had the greatest contempt for Meyerbeer and the form of grand opera identified with the name of that "Ebrew Jew," yet Wagner sought to follow in his steps with "Rienzi," and would, doubtless, have complacently enjoyed the results of success, had success come. But the Parisian enterprise turned out a complete failure. As to this, take Wagner's own words: "After countless vain attempts to gain a hearing from influential people (he does not mention the fact that Meyerbeer stood his friend), I was glad to barely support life by the most menial labour. My great opera, the goal of my wishes, still hovered before me with all its seductive splendours, during this time of utter wretchedness and poverty; I saw about me the very rich and brilliant accessories I needed for it; but saw them thrown away on the enviably exact and correct production of petty and artificial art-works, and ruled by the useless dilettantism of spiritless music." Whether Wagner found comfort then in characteristic abuse of everything in his way matters little. He could not live on abuse, and, as a hunted fox after finding one hole stopped runs about for another, so Wagner surveyed the world of music for a new and untried opening. Here he tells the readers of the North American Review, the old story of a revelation of Beethoven at Habeneck's concerts, of the "Faust Overture"—"a serious symphonic work in the pure German style," of the "Fliegende Holländer," and the opening up of the vast domain of German legend to his enraptured gaze. Beethoven, we are asked to believe, was the cause of all this. He it was who recalled the renegade German, the would-be Meyerbeer of the Paris Grand-Opéra, to his allegiance, and Wagner, when he could do nothing else, answered the call. He went back to Germany "filled with happy hopes," inspired by what does the reader think? By a projected performance at Dresden of the very work, "Rienzi," which he had "in his madness" composed for Paris, and upon which he, with newly born enthusiasm for the purely German, should then have looked with shame and confusion of face. But Wagner was bent upon "getting on," and we may put down all his fine phrases about the indwelling "spirit of our great German school of music," and the apostolic mission resulting therefrom, as so much afterthought and gloss. The man, in point of fact, was neither better nor worse than hundreds of other young adventurers who with some talent and more self-reliance have gone forth to seek their fortune.' But Wagner, who is in some respects the victim of his own conceptions with regard to himself, cannot see this; and his imagination invests all the petty struggles of his early years with a significance about as appropriate as the image of Dulcinia del Toboso in the crazy brain of Don Quixote was like the blowzy damsel of reality.

That which we may be permitted to call the real life of Wagner began at Dresden with the production of "Rienzi," and the rest of the master's contribution to the North American Review is taken up by a very characteristic and exceedingly interesting sketch of it. As however the incidents narrated are well known, and some of them belong to recent history, there is no need to follow them step by step. Enough if we notice whatever in the tone and spirit of the writer throws light upon his curious, nay, in some respects, astonishing individuality.

Throughout the narrative we meet with Wagner's superb self-confidence in its intensest form. His faith in the ego does not diminish with advancing age and fuller experience of a world to which no man is necessary, and it is faith of the kind that moves mountains, because utterly free from doubt. We cannot read this latest utterance of the master without seeing that he is as confident of propagating art in its highest development as he must be that the sun shines in the heavens. Nor can we fail to observe the complement of this—namely that all other masters are, in his view, but gropers after the light to which he has attained, or else positive obstructions in the path of its rays. Wagner's utterances on this subject are always curious, sometimes amusing, and occasionally affecting in what appears a sublime simplicity of belief. One might string them together in infinite variety, as, for example: "I found myself in sharp opposition to the ordinary ideas held by the inartistic spirit of my time; but I felt myself involuntarily in inmost sympathy with the noblest beliefs and efforts of those artists of the past who had thus far been, in their noble isolation, the only true representatives of art in the higher sense. . . . And in the actual carrying out of my undertaking I became once more the true, untrammelled artist." "This example (the 'Nibelungen') should be free from all the inartistic influences and dependences of the wretched conventional stage, which was only able day after day to offer its gaudy attractions," &c. "In this shape there appeared to my imagination an entirely new dramatic institution, designed for the perfect development and worthy presentation of pure art—by which the whole conception of art in general might be raised once more to the full dignity which belonged to it." "The day was celebrated by the rendering of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—itself the ideal corner-stone of that national art which was here to give to the victorious German people the first actual example of a great festal presentation of its results—of a perfected dramatic musical performance." We do not cite these utterances in order to quarrel with them. No man can do great things who has not boundless confidence in the cause he champions, and Wagner's utter belief in his "new art" is a necessity of his position. But it unfortunately happens that the master identifies himself with his gospel to such a degree that acceptance of the one is hardly possible without acceptance of the other. A propos we find a remarkable passage referring to the call made upon Wagner for a repetition of the Nibelungen performances. "It was noteworthy that this call was everywhere addressed to me personally. . . . It was clear that my real more than personal object was even now not understood." Of course not, since Wagner's art has always been "Wagnerism"—that is to say, identified with the individuality of its founder, never thought of but with reference to him, and consequently always invested, to its gain or loss as the case may be, with his personal attributes. Wagner could have made no greater mistake than this, and we marvel at it despite the explanation afforded by his own self-worship. In consequence of it, "Wagnerism" is not only aggressive, as a new cultus should be, but vituperative, impertinent, full of envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness. To accept the "new art" one must shut both eyes to its founder, and that is impossible as long as he invites us to worship him, or compels us to evade the mud with which he is ever ready to bespatter the unconverted. Can an edifice whereinto so much base material enters stand the assaults it challenges? Hardly. The building will be taken down, and whatever is good in it used by wiser artificers.

Another feature in Wagner's recent utterance is the tone of disappointment that runs through it. From the "menial labour" of Paris, in 1840, to the apotheosis of Bayreuth, in 1876, was a stride so enormous that he who took it might fittingly have sung "Nunc dimittis." But Wagner is conscious of the fact that between the present position of his art and the universal ascendancy he desiderates lie a wide interval and many obstacles. Not one Mordecai but a crowd of them sits in the king's gate and refuses obeisance, and the man whom the king delighteth to honour cries, "What availeth aught else while those stubborn knees are straight?" Hear him complain of the opposition to his proposed music-school for the training of Wagnerian artists: "When I came forward with this project it seemed as though all the influences represented in our press and our society united in the bitterest opposition to my work, and to the plan I had joined with it for the permanent and worthy encouragement of German art. . . . Coming from those circles in which the genius of German art was so misunderstood that it seemed to have only the effect of a horrible phantom upon them, the stream of malicious and envious intrigue rose higher and higher against our nobly conceived and nobly intended project." At Bayreuth the German Government refused to help him, and hence another complaint: "But the powers that ruled in Germany, neglectful as ever of the interests of true art, saw in my efforts now, as they had always seen before, nothing but an expression of the most extreme personal ambition." Even after the Festival of 1876 the State would do nothing. "Not a single branch of Government authority could be induced to make an effort to turn what had thus been shown to be entirely possible, to the lasting good of national art." The Festival was pecuniarily unsuccessful, and here was another grievance. "I found myself saddled with a difficult task which, like everything else, I was left alone to carry out. I had personally to make up the considerable deficit which remained after the production of the trilogy had been achieved with such difficulty." Even the bait of "Parsifal" failed to take. Wagner's "Patronatverein" has enrolled no more than sixteen hundred members, and three times that number are required for the purpose in view. So, save for some flattering words to the American people, the article ends amid complaints and cries of distress, into which foreboding of the future as much enters as dissatisfaction with the present.

The lesson of the entire article is a warning against the intrusion of personality into art. In other fields of human enterprise there cannot be too much personality, but art is an affair of principles wholly abstract. Touching upon this Hone has a pregnant sentence: "The life of an artist is one of thought rather than action: he has to speak of the struggles of the mind rather than the conflict of circumstances." But Wagner is action as much as thought, and as often plunges into the battle of events as he enters into the warfare of ideas. Here lies his fatal mistake; and if it be allowable to anticipate the verdict of posterity, we may say that, with admiration for his great ability and gratitude for his advocacy of much truth in connection with the lyric drama, will be mingled wonder at and sorrow for a ceaseless assertion of self and an unmerited vilification of others which scandalised the world.

By Fr. Niecks.

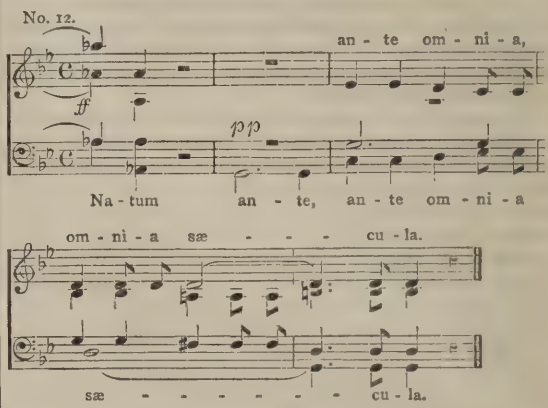
Beethoven's strength seems to grow with the difficulty of the problem. Indeed his genius shines in the "Credo" more brilliantly than in any other part of the "Missa." The astounding power of extracting an emotional contents from the apparently purely abstruse and logical, of grasping manifold details and moulding them into one harmonious whole, which Beethoven there manifests, has never been equalled.

The ground-tone of the "Credo" in the "Missa Solemnis" is firm belief, with the consequent feelings of satisfaction and joyful pride (Allegro ma non troppo, B flat major, C, 123 bars).

No. 11.

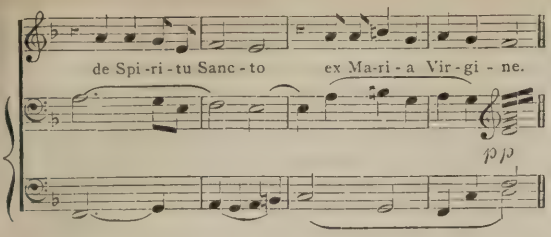
The "I believe in one God," becomes a proclamation of victory, which the orchestra accompanies with a triumphal symphony. The affectionate thought suggested in the midst of this jubilation by the word "Father" is soon drowned in the overwhelming idea of "omnipotence." This passage should be compared with the musical rendering of the same word in the "Gloria." Here the chorus rises by semitones in octaves and unisons to B flat (the small, the once, and the twice accented), which the trebles, altos, and tenors, supported by some of the instruments, sustain for four bars and three-quarters, whilst the basses, the organ, and other instruments surge around them in restless joy. This glorification of the "Maker of heaven and earth" continues till after the words "of things visible," when the worshippers, startled and awed by the idea that next presents itself to their minds, repeat the conjunction "and," and pronounce the word "invisible" in an undertone, the last three syllables in unison and octaves. The reader will by this time have found out that my remark respecting Beethoven's effective use of unisons and octaves was not unjustified. The composer now repeats the word "Credo" and the first portion of the movement, which this time glorifies our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God—"Unum dominum Jesum Christum, filium Dei unigenitum, et ex patre natum." After a close in A flat major, the "ante omnia sæcula" calls forth the following solemn utterance:—

No. 12.



The strings, double bassoon, and the horns and bassoons which enter at the last bar, are the only instruments employed. The sudden outburst of the full orchestra with the chord of the dominant seventh of C major, the successive entrance of the voices, from the lowest to the highest, with the flashing motive, "Deum de Deo, lumen de lumine," the abrupt transitions from C to D flat major, &c., can only be characterised as a dazzling effulgence of light. The phrase "genitum non factum, consubstantialem patri, per quem omnia facta sunt" receives a contrapuntal treatment which might be called formal were it not that the last words inspired the theme with a spirit of gladness which this imparts to the whole passage. A transition to D flat brings us to a passage of deeper emotional import. It is the "qui propter nos homines et propter nostram salutem," with its devoutly contemplative expression, full of loving tenderness and deep-felt gratitude, followed by "descendit de cœlis," the rendering of which words is remarkable for many descriptive and truly poetic traits—the falling of the voices on the word "descended," and their rising again on "from heaven," the entrance of B flat major after minor, the instrumentation, &c. And now we come to a change of movement (Adagio, C, D minor, 20 bars). In the second bar the tenor or tenors (in the older score the passage is found in the stave of the solo-part) begin the "Incarnatus est," being accompanied only by the violas, cellos, and double-basses.

No. 13.



They continue in two-part harmony till, in the eighth bar, the clarionets and bassoon join with a harmonic accompaniment of iterated semiquavers, whereupon some second violins, some first violins, two cellos, and two violas enter successively together with alto, treble, bass, and tenor solo, whilst the first flute warbles sweetly above. The chorus closes this remarkable movement, this wondering gaze at the mystery of the Incarnation, with a hushed, breathless repetition of the words, chanting in monotone, the bass descending in the last bar to the fifth below. How strangely this movement affects one! It is one of those things that haunt one for days and nights, and the impression of which can never be wholly effaced by time. The homely language of the "Et homo factus est" (Andante, D major, 3-4, 12 bars) tells us clearly that we are again in our own world and on known ground. Beethoven gives to this passage the expression of gladness—for are these not good tidings? The feeling of relief is prominent in the cadence-like opening phrase. The repeated exclamation "homo," full of joyful astonishment, should be noted. By no composer and in no instance has the "Crucifixus" been conceived with such depth of feeling as by Beethoven in this Op. 123 (Adagio expressivo, D minor, 3-4, 32 bars). Now the words are muttered as if sorrow had stunned the beholders, bereaved them of all sensibility except that of a dull, brooding pain; now they are gasped out with a heart-breaking expression. And what a beautiful delicate touch the repetition of "etiam pro nobis!" Yea, for us He was crucified. Mark also the change of expression from pity to severity with the words "sub Pontio Pilato"; and then again the transition to tenderness and sorrow with "passus"—the sighs and sobs of the solo voices, the wailing of the instruments, the murmurs of the chorus, till at last also their sorrow becomes melodious. But hark! "Et resurrexit tertia die." He is risen! The voices resound with a clear metallic ring. A flood of light seems suddenly to stream in brilliant, piercing rays through the opening clouds.

The effect produced by these decisive progressions of triads, all in their original position, and—one excepted—all major, with their bold rhythm, sung by the unaccompanied chorus in the high registers of their voices, is most striking. And what a strong contrast between the energy and morning-like freshness of this and the languor and oppressive atmosphere of the preceding movement, with its chromatic progressions and minor and dimished chords! In the "et ascendit" all the voices and instruments move in an ascending direction, one after another, higher and higher. We raise our eyes, follow the ascent, and, looking in at heaven's gates, behold Him seated on the right hand of the Father—"sedet ad dexteram Patris." What glory! what a jubilee! Is it not as if—

> The bright seraphim in burning row
> Their loud up-lifted angel-trumpets blow,
> And the cherubic host in thousand quires,
> Touch their immortal harps of golden wires?

But He will come again in His glory—"et iterum venturus est." Here already the pure joy of the F major is somewhat disturbed by the entrance of F minor, soon superseded by D flat, A flat, &c.; then after a descending D flat major scale comes a C flat, and a dark, fearful, threatening shadow rises up before us. He will come to judge the quick and the dead—"Judicare vivos et mortuos." First one of the trombones is heard, then a second, one of the horns, the organ, and the tenors of the chorus, after that the other instruments and voices. The gloom that lies over the whole of this passage, the trepidation of the reiteration of "vivos," and the awfulness of the utterance of "et mortuos" with the hollow-eyed fifth, have a grand and terrifying effect. But the shadow passes away, and with the words "cujus regni non erit finis," the jubilation, now in D major, begins again. This passage modulates and leads to an Allegro ma non troppo, C, in D flat major, the return of the first movement and its motives. Beethoven rises here into an enthusiasm of faith. "Credo" is again and again repeated by every part of the chorus, and interspersed between the other words of this section—"et in spiritum sanctum Dominum vivificantem, qui cum patre et filio simul adoratur et glorificatur, qui locutus est per Prophetas et in unam catholicam et apostolicam Ecclesiam." The culminating point, however, is the "expecto resurrectionem mortuorum, et vitam venturi sæculi. Amen"—the word "mortuorum" receiving again a characteristic sombre colouring. After this follows the concluding portion of the "Credo," a fugal comment on the words "et vitam venturi. Amen" (Allegretto ma non troppo, B flat major, 3-2, 67 bars). The fugue is one with two subjects. The trebles propose the first subject, the tenors, starting a little more than a bar later, the second, and then follow in succession the altos and basses, tenors and trebles, and basses and altos.

After an episode of a little more than a bar the altos take up the first subject again; but already in the next bar the trebles do the same, producing thus a stretto (this passage is marked scherzando, which Lenz rightly explains to mean "with a light heart"), whilst the tenors bring forward the second subject. Then the two subjects are respectively given out by the altos and trebles, basses and altos (the last-mentioned part inverting the second subject), tenors and basses, trebles and altos (the second subject once more in inversion); next follows a free working-out of various motives of the exposition, which leads into an Allegro con moto (100 bars). The cellos and double-basses adhere still to the first subject of the fugue in its original proportions, the violins and violas prepare us for the diminution in which the subject is given out anon by the voices, and the wood winds suggest the motive, the inversion and diminution of the counter-subject, out of which the new second subject is built. At the end of the sixth bar the tenors begin; they are joined four crotchets later by the trebles with the second subject (No. 16*a*), and at due intervals follow the altos and basses, trebles and tenors, basses and altos. A stretto comes next, in which we will note the rhythmically more closely drawn form of the first subject (No. 16*b*).

In the remaining part of this movement old materials are utilised for new constructions; we recognise motives from the original first subject, and from the first and second subjects and the counter-subject of this movement. The pedal-point on the dominant F, which however does not land us in B flat, and the passage where the whole chorus sings the first subject in its original form and the orchestra opposes to this the same subject in diminution, are very grand, as indeed is the fugue from beginning to end. Soon after the last-mentioned passage we come to a Grave, in the seventh bar of which a piano intervenes, whereupon the solo voices, supported by a simple choral and orchestral accompaniment, begin to pour forth florid divisions, cunningly interwoven. One is reminded of the "Jubilus," the "Longus tonus jubilationis" of the Middle Ages, although there can be little real resemblance between the rude simplicity of that time and the high art of a Beethoven. This Coda is a wonderful conclusion to a wonderful composition, growing indeed more wonderful the farther we proceed. The ascending scales, with which the solo voices end their jubilation, are taken up by some of the instruments. The double-basses and cellos begin, after them follow in succession the violas, the first violins, and the first flutes, whilst the chorus and solo voices sustain the tonic chord of B flat major, the dominant in the uppermost part, pp. After two energetic shouts of "Amen"—chorus and full orchestra, ff—this excelsior movement begins again, now in the bassoons, clarionets, and oboe, first singly, then in thirds, and lastly in thirds and sixths; after that the strings, the double-basses and cellos, the violas, and first and second violins follow at double speed. The pianissimo close, with the sustained notes of the voices, wood winds, horns and trumpets, the semiquavers of the violins and violas, the rolling of the kettle-drum, the pizzicato of the cellos and double-basses, along with which go the three trombones, is quite ethereal. We are lifted above this earth into purer regions, are carried away from the present, and behold the glories of the life to come. "And One sat on the throne. And He that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone; and there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald."

How different is this and other fugues of Beethoven's from those of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Cherubini, and all the men who distinguished themselves in this genre! It is a kind of rustica—nay, let me rather call it cyclopean. The themes come upon us with the force of sledge-hammers. All is grand, powerful, and quivering with ardent thought. What has been said of Milton's prose works may be said with redoubled emphasis of most of Beethoven's music, "the impression of an intense individuality settles down on us . . . like a physical weight." Beethoven furnishes in this Mass another proof of the legitimacy of the contrapuntal forms. Indeed the common sentiments of a multiplicity can nowhere find a truer expression than in the fugal form, taking the word "fugal" in its most liberal signification. Marx describes the form pithily as the "wechselseitige Beeiferung verschiedener Stimmen um einen Hauptgedanken." I am tempted to characterise it as the lyric choral form par excellence, however paradoxical that may appear. Here may be fitly inserted Schindler's account of how he found Beethoven when composing the "et vitam venturi":—

If I think of the occurrences of the year 1819, especially of the time when the tone-poet was in the Hafner Haus at Mödling, busy with the composition of the Credo, and recall to my mind his mental excitement, I must confess that I neither before nor after this time of detachment from the world noticed anything similar in him. Let me mention only one circumstance. Towards the end of August, I went in company with the musician, Johann Horzalka, still living at Vienna, to the lodgings of the master at Mödling. It was four o'clock in the afternoon. No sooner had we entered than we heard that Beethoven's two servants had left him the same morning, and that there had been after midnight a scene which disturbed all the lodgers in the house, because in consequence of long waiting both had fallen asleep, and the prepared dishes had become unfit to be eaten. In one of the sitting-rooms we heard the master singing, howling, and stamping over the fugue of the Credo. After we had listened long enough to this almost awful scene, and were on the point of leaving, the door opened, and Beethoven stood before us with a discomposed countenance which inspired anxiety. His first remarks were confused, as if he were disagreeably surprised at our having overheard him. Soon, however, he began to speak of the event of the day, and observed with remarkable composure, "Pretty business this! they have all run away, and I have eaten nothing since yesterday."

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

Mendelssohn appears to have been more worried by the matter of the Directorship for which he was persuaded to compete than, at first, he allowed to appear. So much may be gathered from a portion of a letter addressed to Pastor Bauer: "Since I set to work again, I feel in such good spirits that I am anxious to adhere to it as closely as possible, so it monopolises every moment that I do not spend with my own family. Such a period as this last half year having passed away makes me feel doubly grateful. It is like the sensation of going out for the first time after a long illness, and, in fact, such a term of uncertainty, doubt and suspense really amounted to a malady, and one of the worst kind too. I am, now, however, entirely cured, so, when you think of me, do so as of a joyous musician, who is doing many things, who is resolved to do many more, and who would fain accomplish all that can be done." It was not unnatural that, after such an experience, Mendelssohn should wish to leave Berlin and work elsewhere. Coming to this determination he fixed upon Düsseldorf as a place of temporary abode, and explained why to Pastor Schubring. "I must . . . proceed to Düsseldorf, where you are probably aware that I directed the Musical Festival, and subsequently decided on taking up my residence there for two or three years, nominally in order to direct the church music, and the Vocal Association, and probably also a new theatre which is now being built, but in reality for the purpose of securing quiet and leisure for composition. The country and people suit me admirably, and in the winter 'St. Paul' is to be given." To the Lower Rhenish town our master went accordingly, and proceeded with his first great Oratorio. We cannot do better than see him engaged upon this task in such light as his own words afford. We have already heard him discussing the subject with Devrient, and know that his clerical friends Bauer and Schubring were invited to help in preparing the book. It is to the second of these gentlemen that we now find Mendelssohn writing in terms highly suggestive of the keen and intelligent interest he took in the subject for which he had to provide music: "Just as I was beginning to arrange the sheets of my Oratorio, and meditating on the music that I intended to write for it this winter, I received your letter enclosing your extracts, which appeared to me so good that I transcribed the whole text as far as it has gone, and now return it to you with the same request as at first—that you will kindly send me your remarks and additions. You will perceive various annotations on the margin as to the passages I wish to have from the Bible or the Hymn Book. I am anxious also to have your opinion, 1st, As to the form of the whole, especially the narrative part, and whether you think that the general arrangement may be retained—the blending of the narrative and dramatic representation. I dare not adopt the Bach form along with this personified recital, so this combination seems to me the most natural, and not very difficult except in such passages, for example, as Ananias, owing to the length of the continuous narration. 2nd, Whether you are of opinion that any of the principal features in the history or the acts, and also in the character and teaching of St. Paul, have been either omitted or falsified. 3rd, Where the divisions of the first and second parts should be marked. 4th, Whether you approve of my employing chorales. From this I have been strongly dissuaded by various people, and yet I cannot decide on giving it up entirely, for I think it must be in character with any oratorio founded on the New Testament. If this be also your opinion, then you must supply me with all the hymns and passages. You see that I require a great deal from you, but I wish first to enter fully into the spirit of the words, and then the music shall follow." How much wiser was Mendelssohn than his advisers? and what a loss to "St. Paul" and to art would have resulted had he given ear to their suggestions! In that case the Oratorio and the world would now know nothing of "Sleepers, wake," "To Thee, O Lord," and the divine prayer, "O Thou, the true and only Light." The composition of the Oratorio did not progress very rapidly, and it is nearly twelve months before we find Mendelssohn again writing on the subject to his good friend, Schubring. On his own showing he blew hot and cold with regard to the work: "Last autumn I got your letter with the notes for 'St. Paul' . . . and that very same forenoon I began to ponder seriously on the matter, took up my Bible in the midst of all the disorder of my room, and was soon so absorbed in it that I could scarcely force myself," &c. But ". . . when I really did commence in Spring, so many anxieties about my composition ensued that they unsettled me." From subsequent remarks upon the text of the Oratorio we gather the interesting fact that Mendelssohn soon learned to prefer the unaltered words of the Bible: ". . . it is singular and good that, in the course of composition, all the passages that for various reasons I formerly wished to transpose or alter, I have replaced exactly as I find them in the Bible—it is ever the best of all." Another letter on the same theme soon followed, and here we find some very characteristic and common-sense remarks in answer to Schubring, who had showed the text of "St. Paul" to Schneider, and apologised for a possibly imprudent act: "How could you for one moment imagine that I was annoyed? . . . Why should I take umbrage at that? I hope you do not consider me one of those who, when once they have an idea in their heads, guard it as jealously as a miser does his gold, and allow no man to approach till they produce it themselves. There is certainly nothing really wrong in this, and yet such jealous solicitude is most odious in my eyes; and even if it were to occur that someone should plagiarise my design I should feel the same; for one of the two must be the better, and then it is all right, or neither are good, and then it is no matter." From this magnanimous mood Mendelssohn passed quickly, after his fashion, to one of humorous description: "The first part of 'St. Paul' is now nearly completed, and I stand before it ruminating like a cow who is afraid to go through a new door, and I never seem to finish it; indeed, the overture is still wanting, and a heavy piece of work it will be. Immediately after the Lord's words to St. Paul on his conversion, I have introduced a great chorus, 'Arise and shine,' and this I, as yet, consider the best movement of the first part." From this time the Oratorio progressed more rapidly, and three months later (November, 1834) Mendelssohn was able to announce that much of the second part only needed writing down: "I have just arrived at that point with 'St. Paul' when I should be so glad to play it over to someone, but I can find no eligible person. It is true that my friends here are very enthusiastic with regard to it, but this does not prove much. The cantor (his sister Fanny) is wanting, with her thick eyebrows and her criticism. I have the second part now nearly all in my head, up to the passage where they take Paul for Jupiter, and wish to offer sacrifices to him, for which some fine choruses must be found, but as yet I have not the faintest conception what . . . it is difficult." A little later, Mendelssohn wrote to the "Cantor" with the thick eyebrows: "A few days ago I sketched the overture of 'St. Paul,' and thought I should at least contrive to get it finished, but it is still a long way behind." And another reference to the work occurs in a letter to his sister Rebecca (December, 1833): "To-day I have completed and transcribed an entire chorus for 'St. Paul' . . . The non-appearance of St. Paul at the stoning of Stephen is certainly a blemish, and I could easily alter the passage in itself; but I could find absolutely no mode of introducing him at the time, and no words for him to utter in accordance with the Scriptural narrative; therefore, it seemed to me more expedient to follow the Bible account, and to make Stephen appear alone. I think, however, that your other censure (Mendelssohn is now addressing his father through his sister) is obviated by the music; for the recitative of Stephen, though the words are long, will not occupy more than two or three minutes, or—including all the choruses till his death—about a quarter of an hour; whereas, subsequently, at and after the conversion, the music becomes more diffuse, though the words are fewer." In March, 1834, the master had so far advanced with the work as to have hopes of finishing it in April. Hence, he wrote to Spohr: "I began an oratorio about a year ago which I expect to finish next month, the subject of which is St. Paul. Some friends have compiled the words for me from the Bible, and I think that both the subject and the compilation are well adapted for music and very solemn—if the music only prove as good as I wish. At all events, I have enjoyed the most intense delight while writing it." When next the Oratorio is spoken of (April, 1835) though still unfinished, it is as on the eve of performance. Thus Mendelssohn to his father: "My Oratorio is to be performed in Frankfort in November, so Schelble writes me; and much as I should like you to hear it soon, I should prefer your hearing it first next year at the (Düsseldorf) Musical Festival." We have seen how the master longed to play his work to some duly qualified and congenial listener, and now let us note that the opportunity came to him shortly after his removal to Leipsic in 1835, the listener being no other than Chopin, of whom he wrote: "It was so pleasant for me to be once more with a thorough musician, not with those half virtuosos, half classics, who would gladly combine in music les honneurs de la vertu et les plaisirs du vice, but with one who has his perfect and well-defined phase. However far asunder we may be in our different spheres I can get on famously with such a person, but not with those half-and-half people." Then follows a description, in the master's best vein, of what took place at their meeting: "Sunday evening was really very remarkable. When Chopin made me play over my Oratorio to him, while curious Leipzigers stole into the room to see him, and when, between the first and second parts, he dashed into his new 'Etudes' and a new Concerto, to the amazement of the Leipzigers, and then I resumed my 'St. Paul,' it was just as if a Cherokee and a Kaffir had met to converse." The end of 1835 came, and "St. Paul" had not even then received its finishing touch, with such fastidious care did Mendelssohn work. At this time, however, his energies received a strong but mournful stimulus through the death of his father, who had taken a great interest in the Oratorio. We gather this from a letter to Schubring: "I shall now labour with double zeal at the completion of 'St. Paul,' for my father urged me to it in the very last letter he wrote to me, and he looked forward very impatiently to the completion of my work. I feel as if I must exert all my energies to finish it, and make it as good as possible, and then think that he takes an interest in it. . . . To-day, for the first time, I have begun once more to work at it, and intend now to do so daily. When it is concluded, what is to come next? God will direct." The master kept his word, and "St. Paul" was ready for the Lower Rhenish Musical Festival at Düsseldorf in the summer of 1836. Of the performance and his feelings at the time, Mendelssohn gave an account to a friend which is both curious and interesting. "You would assuredly have been delighted by the love and goodwill with which the whole affair was carried on, and the marvellous fire with which the chorus and orchestra burst forth, though there were individual passages, especially in the solos, which might have annoyed you. I think I see your face could you have heard St. Paul's arias sung in an indifferent mechanical manner, and I think I hear you breaking loose on the Apostle of the Gentiles in your dressing-gown, but then I know also how charmed you would have been with the 'Rise up,' which went really splendidly. My feelings were singular. During the whole of the rehearsals and the performance I thought little enough about directing, but listened eagerly to the general effect, and whether it went right according to my idea, without thinking of anything else. When they gave me a flourish of trumpets or applauded, it was welcome for a moment, but then my father came back to my mind, and I strove once more to recall my thoughts to my work. Thus, during the entire performance I was almost in the position of a listener, and tried to retain an impression of the whole. Many parts caused me much pleasure, others not so; but I learnt a lesson from it all, and hope to succeed better the next time I write an Oratorio." Apart from the modesty of these expressions, they are of extreme interest as showing us Mendelssohn's attitude towards his own works. No more singular picture is found in musical biography than that representing the composer of "St. Paul" as detaching himself from the performance, even in the act of conducting, and sitting in judgment on number after number, praising here, blaming there, and generally hoping that the author might be able to "do better next time." We cannot read these letters attentively without discovering that this was always Mendelssohn's relation to his works. He had no severer critic than Mendelssohn himself, and herein lay the cause of his extreme fastidiousness, and the reason why so many compositions never, during his lifetime, saw the light. A propos, may be cited a suggestive passage from a letter to Rebecca Dirichlet: "I only wish you would write to me a few times more about it and very minutely as to my other music. The whole time that I have been here I have worked at 'St. Paul,' because I wish to publish it in as complete a form as possible, and, moreover, I am quite convinced that the beginning of the first and the end of the second parts are now nearly three times as good as they were—which was, indeed, my duty, for in many points, especially as to subordinate matters in so large a work, I only succeed by degrees in realising my thoughts and expressing them clearly. In the principal movements and melodies I cannot indeed make any alterations, because they occur at once to my mind just as they are, but I am not sufficiently advanced to say this of every part."

No apology will be required for devoting so much space to Mendelssohn as the composer of "St. Paul." Every word uttered by the master in relation to his greatest works is of interest and, better still, of significance, as bearing upon his own intellectual and artistic nature.

Apart from the Oratorio, there is no continuous topic in the Düsseldorf letters, but they are, nevertheless, full of most valuable passages touching upon a variety of subjects in Mendelssohn's best vein. These may be taken in order as they present themselves. As we already know, the master's duties in the Lower Rhenish town included direction of the church music, and he is now seen in the act of experiencing some of the disagreeables of his office. On a certain day the choir was to take part in an open-air procession, for which the then Burgomaster demanded better music than had been tolerated by his predecessors. The minister, of course, consulted Mendelssohn upon the subject, and both had an interview with a third interested party, which the master may be left to describe: "A very crabbed old musician in a threadbare coat was summoned, whose office it had hitherto been to beat time. When he came and they attacked him, he declared that he neither could nor would have better music; if any improvement was required someone else must be employed; that he knew perfectly what vast pretensions some people made now-a-days, everything was expected to sound so beautiful; this had not been the case in his day, and he played just as well now as formerly. I was really very reluctant to take the affair out of his hands, though there could be no doubt that others would do infinitely better; and I could not help thinking how I should myself feel were I to be summoned some fifty years hence to a town-hall, and spoken to in such a strain, and a young green-horn snubbed me, and my coat were seedy, and I had not the most remote idea why the music should be better—and I felt rather uncomfortable." The feeling did him honour, but somewhat unfitted him for posts which entailed the disagreeable necessity of appearing harsh to individuals. Mendelssohn was too soft-hearted for such work, and could not deprive a family of their bread without painful qualms. This he found out after having accepted the post of Intendant for Music at the Düsseldorf Theatre—a post he abandoned at the end of a few weeks' experience of its troubles. In a letter to his sister Rebecca, Mendelssohn gives a most comical account of the miseries from which he beat so hasty a retreat: "Then I was desired to engage an orchestra—that is, prepare two contracts for each member, and previously fight to the death about a dollar more or less of their monthly salary; then they went away, then they came back and signed all the same; then they all objected to sit at the second music-desk; then came the aunt of a very wretched performer whom I could not engage, and the wife and two little children of another miserable musician, to intercede with the director; then I allowed three fellows to play on trial, and they played so utterly beneath contempt that I really could not agree to take any of them; then they looked very humble, and went quietly away very miserable, having lost their daily bread; then came the wife again and wept. Out of thirty persons there was only one who said at once 'I am satisfied,' and signed his contract; all the others bargained and haggled for an hour at least before I could make them understand that I had a fixed price . . . they were four of the most disagreeable days I ever passed. . . . The chorus got drunk and I was forced to speak with authority; then they rebelled against the manager and I was obliged to shout at them like the boots at an inn; then Madame Beutler became hoarse, and I was very anxious on her account. . . . In short, I made up my mind to abdicate my Intendant throne three weeks after the re-opening of the theatre." Fancy Mendelssohn, with his susceptible nature and nervous organisation, thrown into the midst of all these worries! There could only be one end, and that a speedy one. The place would have killed him had he remained in it, while how great was the relief of leaving its cares and troubles we can gather from his own words: "Since I have withdrawn from this sphere I feel as if I were a fish thrown back into the water; my forenoons are once more at my own disposal, and in the evenings I can sit at home and read." The step was, however, followed by a severe reproof from Mendelssohn père, who saw in the manner of its taking further evidence of his son's tendency to "austerity and irascibility, suddenly grasping an object and as suddenly relinquishing it." "Instead of persevering in your duties in this sense," wrote Abraham Mendelssohn, "and getting rid of all odiosa, you allowed yourself to be overwhelmed by them, and as they naturally became most obnoxious to you, instead of quietly striving to remedy them, and thus gradually to get rid of them, you at one leap extricated yourself, and by so doing you undeniably subjected yourself to the imputation of fickleness and unsteadiness. . . . If I view this matter incorrectly, then teach me a better mode of judging." To this it may be replied, that while Felix acted hastily in assuming duties he might have foreseen would be irksome, he, nevertheless, did well to extricate himself at once from a position which utter incompatibility made hopeless. It would be folly to harness Pegasus to a plough, but still greater folly to counsel the winged horse to make the best of having to trudge on his four legs among the furrows. The only remedy is a knife at work upon the traces. In his more fitting capacity as conductor of the Düsseldorf orchestra, Mendelssohn's course was not quite smooth, but this he could dismiss with a joke: "I have just come from the rehearsal of 'Egmont,' where, for the first time in my life, I beat a score to pieces from rage at the stupidity of the musici, whom I feed with 6-8 time in due form, though they still require far more babes' milk. Then they like to belabour each other in the orchestra. This I don't choose they should do in my presence, so furious scenes sometimes occur. At the air 'Glücklich allein,' I fairly tore the music in two, on which they played with much more expression." The notion of terrifying an orchestra into expressive playing by tearing the score in two is a notion which, though costly, should not be lost upon the many conductors who have found all other means inadequate. By way of appendix to what we have already seen of Mendelssohn at the theatre, may now be given some remarks in answer to Pastor Schubring, who, in a letter to the master, had strongly attacked the stage: "I am by no means of opinion that the theatre is pernicious to three-fourths of mankind, and I believe that those who are injured by it would find the same detriment, or perhaps worse, elsewhere, without any theatre. For there at least we do not find the vapid reality that exists in the world, and as a general rule I do not consider anything wrong in itself because it may lead to bad results, but only when it must produce them. In a theatrical public such as you describe there are depraved people only, and no healthy ones who visit the theatre to see a piece as a work of art. I know that to myself it always was either tiresome or elevating (more commonly the former, I own), but pernicious it never appeared to me." All which words are the words of truth and soberness.

MUSIC IN CONGRESS.

It is most satisfactory to find that, wherever or whenever a "Congress" is held which can fairly reckon music as within the sphere of its operations, the "divine art" receives a share of attention. We may, perhaps, account for this in some measure by reference to the fact that a musical paper, attended, as it generally is, by vocal or instrumental illustrations, affords pleasant relief from the pursuit of drier if not graver subjects. But, after making due allowance on this score, it is impossible not to see from the character of those who take part in the discussions, and the earnest tone of their utterances, that music is really looked upon as a serious matter outside the limits of the profession. This state of things, we believe, will become more marked as the influence and importance of the art receive greater and greater recognition. Whether the object be to lift the soul towards the Supreme, or to purify the ordinary current of emotion, music is a power that men will take into account precisely according to the measure in which they know it. During the present autumn the subject, in various phases, has been before two Congresses, one of which was, almost as a matter of course, the Church Congress recently held in Cardiff. Music at such a gathering has a raison d'être wholly unassailable. Indeed the wonder is, not that it receives a small share of attention—generally at the end of the session, when everybody is fatigued—but that it does not take precedence of a dozen other subjects, which, if more ardently debated, are far less important to the progress—we had almost said the popularity—of our Church. We need not fall back upon Luther for a testimony to the value of music as an element in religious worship. Experience and observation go to show that it is one of the most potent weapons in the armoury of those by whom the great campaign against the world, the flesh, and the devil is carried on. The exponent of Church Music at Cardiff was the Rev. Thomas Helmore, M.A. Mr. Helmore's consistent services in the good cause for many years need no testimony from us; and it might have been foreseen that he would present his subject in the most practical of forms, with a view to the union of all in hearty praise. The essayist treated first of Plain-Song, and next of "measured music," sub-dividing both into ancient and modern sections, and regarding the simple unison chants of our time as a legitimate succession to the Gregorian music; while modern services and anthems are an equivalent development of the Canto figurato of Palestrina and his compeers. It need scarcely be added that Mr. Helmore showed a marked preference both for Gregorian plain-song on the one hand, and the Canto figurato of the old masters on the other. This, in his view, is the true music of the Church, because essentially sacred in character, and derived in no respect from secular sources. Something might, doubtless, be advanced on the other hand, since the reasons must be very cogent indeed which dictate finality to the highest form of art. But Mr. Helmore and those who think with him do exceeding good service by vindicating the sublimity of the old Church forms and the grandeur of the early masters. They put a drag on the modern tendency towards a more sensuous and effeminate school, and hold up a model that, albeit no one need slavishly imitate it, exerts a priceless influence. Mr. Helmore had some timely words, also, for clergymen who do not put themselves in thorough accord with their musical services, the mode of conducting which, he said, "should vary according to the sentiment of the words and the season of the Christian year." The essayist even thought it necessary to remind his hearers—with how much reason most of us know—that "confession should be sung reverently and in a low tone, and not as though it were praise, in a joyful and jubilant strain." Similarly, and on grounds quite as good, he argued for "raising the character of the music in point of grandeur and impressiveness, in proportion to the solemnity of the several parts of the Service." How frequently this is neglected the least observant church-goer must have noticed. "It is too often the case in our churches," said Mr. Helmore, "that the most penitential part of the Service is sung by the choir with an elaboration of harmony and vocal utterance as though they gloried in their transgressions, while the songs in which the church on earth joins 'with angels and archangels and all the company of heaven'—the 'Sanctus' and the 'Gloria in excelsis'—are left to be muttered by the more devout, though less tuneful members of the congregation." Whatever may be thought of Mr. Helmore's decided preference for ancient Church music, all must agree that he here pointed to a serious blemish, and one as undevotional as it is inartistic. No matter what taste may prevail in this or that quarter, there is a right way and a wrong one of using the materials preferred, and too often the careful adaptation of means to end observable outside the church walls is treated as needless inside. Mr. Helmore deserves the thanks alike of Churchmen and musicians for pointing this out, and showing how the precious talent entrusted to the Church can be best put to usury till the Master comes and reckons with His servants.

The second paper to which reference has been made was read by Mr. Charles Hallé at the Social Science Congress held in Manchester. In this case the object of the essayist was to contrast the present condition of music in England with what it was forty years ago when he came to reside amongst us. The task could be no other than agreeable, since it is beyond question that, in the time considered, our art has made immense progress, both as a subject of popular education and as to the power of appreciating that which is really good. At the same time Mr. Hallé seems not to have accurately informed himself upon matters of detail, which, it is but fair to add, he could hardly know from personal observation. He does not give us, for example, the full credit deserved for what was doing in music forty years ago, while he is wholly mistaken in supposing that Beethoven's Sonatas were not at that time frequently heard in our concert-rooms. But upon these errors we will not insist, although they are the more regretable because a little research would have made them impossible. They do not touch Mr. Hallé's main argument, which is that there has been a mighty advance both in knowledge and taste, till, now, England is not far, if at all, behind the most cultured nations of the continent. Mr. Hallé did good service by calling attention to this fact from the height of his own position as a leading master of the art. His word will not be doubted, since he is not an Englishman blinded by patriotism; while it cannot but derive weight from the consideration that he enjoys exceptional opportunities of forming a correct judgment. The paper has naturally excited a good deal of attention, and its errors have been freely pointed out. We, however, are content to dwell upon the central and undisputed truth of our national progress, and to be thankful to Mr. Hallé for his own long-extended and successful labours in aid of the result.

The letters which have recently appeared in several newspapers respecting the education of "farmers' daughters" may be regarded as a significant sign of the times. That knowledge will no longer be a luxury for the rich and influential is now an admitted fact; and the object should now be, therefore, to see that the education given is not only sound but useful. In a communication addressed to a morning contemporary we have a practical illustration of the value of musical culture in the home of a Westmoreland farmer. The writer tells us that the farmer's daughter, a girl of fifteen, took her place at the harmonium in church, the usual performer, the village schoolmaster, being absent for his holiday. "On our return," he says, "she played us some sacred music on the piano, and sang a few hymns and songs; but after tea she disappeared for a long time, and at last her mother said, 'Our servant-girl is gone out this evening; so Annie has had to milk.' On which we asked to see the cows, and on going to the back of the house there was our accomplished young friend in a dark cotton-gown feeding some half-dozen calves which were pressing round her in the yard. When these were satisfied the pigs had to be attended to; and then the young lady, resuming her Sunday attire, went back to her piano." Now much has been said about the absurdity of persons in certain stations of life devoting time to the study of music; but surely this can only apply to those who acquire it merely as a flimsy and showy accomplishment, instead of as a lifelong source of solid intellectual enjoyment. To neglect the important duties of life for the sake of singing and playing is reprehensible in the extreme: but what shall be said of a young lady who performs on the harmonium at church, entertains her visitors with songs and hymns at home, and then cheerfully goes to feed the calves and pigs in the farmyard? We are often called upon to cite instances of the abuse of music; but this sensible daughter of the Westmoreland farmer has shown us the use of it.

The readers of this journal who have for many years followed our periodical strictures upon the management of the two Italian Operas in this country must recollect not only that we were the first to draw attention to their utter disregard of the advanced musical culture of the day, but also to affirm that the ultra-fashionable section of the public to which the lessees almost exclusively appealed could no longer be relied upon for that support which was freely accorded before the claims of the "people" became also distinctly recognised. Why, we constantly urged, should not lovers of music be enabled to hear works written for the stage, as well as those written for the concert-room for a reasonable outlay? why also cannot they (if they please) go to the Opera without dressing as if for an evening party? and why should they not be certain of reaching their homes after a performance in the evening without being compelled to encroach upon a portion of the next morning? Presuming that all these reforms were granted, there would be no necessity for asking why a better class of music could not be given; for, on the mere mercantile principle of supply and demand, were artistic enthusiasts, instead of fashionable loungers, to be catered for, the kind of entertainment provided for them would assuredly be adapted to their requirements. The practical answer to our suggestions has been given by Mr. Mapleson by his now annual autumn season of Italian Opera. Excellent artists are provided, moderate prices for admission are charged; there is no restriction as to dress, and the performances are over at a reasonable hour. Considering how thoroughly all these arrangements are in accordance with our desires, we need scarcely say that we wish this enterprising lessee every success; and have now merely to express a hope that the autumn series of performances may eventually prove to be the real season, and the fashionable series the "off" one.

We recollect once hearing an enthusiastic admirer of the drama warmly eulogise what he termed the well-known lines of Shakespeare, "Off with his head; so much for Buckingham!" and on being told that they were not written by Shakespeare, he not only expressed his astonishment, but boldly asserted that no person was justified in interpolating clap-trap speeches for the purpose of deceiving those who were not sufficiently acquainted with the original text to detect the imposition. We confess that we thoroughly sympathise with him. It is true that many may urge in defence of such alterations the fact that sensational additions are only termed "clap-trap" when they are found not to be a portion of the work; but, even admitting this, it does not affect the artistic view of the question. If popular applause is to be sought at the expense of an author there is an end of all purity in the presentation of works before the public. It is unnecessary here to refer to certain editions of standard musical compositions where the authors' notes have been altered, or to the "new readings" of some instrumental executants, because in the course of our criticisms in this journal we have often commented upon these abuses; but with the liberties taken by vocalists at the recent musical festivals fresh in our recollection, we cannot but again call attention to this growing evil, in the hope that singers of established reputation may boldly restore the original text before the false, instead of the true, has taken too firm a hold of the public to admit of so salutary a reform. Handel, for example, knew perfectly well the compass of the human voice, and would have written the high notes now sung had he wanted them. We know how confidently the listeners expect these brilliant climaxes in certain passages; but any singer of eminence boldly refusing to gratify these expectations would set a noble example which would certainly be speedily and most extensively followed.

An adventurer once applied to a rich man to lend him money for the purpose of bringing out a book the sale of which, he said, would most certainly raise him from a state of poverty to one of comparative comfort. Upon being told that the title of this book was "Twenty Ways of acquiring a Fortune," the millionaire at once replied that there could be no occasion to assist so wise a man, since he had only to select one of these "ways" and acquire a fortune himself. We are constantly reminded of this story by the advertisements we daily read in the papers; many of those who insert them being, on their own showing, fully able to realise a competence without either trouble or expense. In music this is especially observable; for if persons who undertake to teach by their "new method" in a few months more than can be taught by the most eminent masters on the old "method" in as many years, could really perform their promise, there would be no need of growing grey in the public service, since they might have retired in affluent circumstances at an early age. But the following advertisement, copied from a contemporary, and headed "Challenge to the World," transcends all the experiments on the credulity of the public we have yet seen: "I will pay £5 to any person, not blind, and in full possession of their faculties, who fails to play a piano or harmonium by my system immediately, without the slightest knowledge of music, or of the instrument itself. Full instructions, post-free, twelve stamps." Now, deducting the cost of the stamp for the "Instructions" from the fee demanded, the proprietor of this invaluable secret actually enables any individual, not suffering under the physical infirmity named, to become an instrumental performer for elevenpence. This is indeed a tempting bait to those who unthinkingly clutch at such offers; but it becomes a question whether a person "in full possession of their faculties" will be likely to invest even twelve stamps upon so doubtful a security.

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By Our Special Correspondent.)

In the matter of musical festivals, as of many other things, the public see results and not processes, and are often in danger of falsely estimating the one because ignorant of the other. As regards the Triennial Festival established at Bristol in 1873, and celebrated for the third time last month, it is on this account easy to form erroneous impressions. One might suppose, for example, that the enterprise, enjoying the unanimous support of all parties in the Western city, has obtained a firm hold of life. But those behind the scenes know better, and it is well that the broad facts of the case should be familiar also to the public at large—not for the purpose of blaming anybody, but in the interest of correct judgment. Nearly all young institutions have to contend against the rivalries of their friends, division among whom, though it may lead to future benefit, has a weakening influence in the present. Without entering upon details of purely local interest, I may state that such is the position of the Bristol Festival. The managers have, no doubt, done a good deal in the face of disturbing influences; but, these absent, they might have done a good deal more, for the non-doing of which it would be unfair to blame them. Let us hope that this state of things will quickly cease and determine, and that a middle way may be found along which all can move in amity towards the attainment of a common purpose. At present concord seems remote, though hope of it arose when a proposal was made to invest the Festival with the religious character of that held in the cities of the Three Choirs, and transfer its celebration from Colston Hall to the Cathedral. But here also local jealousies intervened, and certain stipulations made by the Dean and Chapter put an end, for the time being at least, to negotiations. I mention these circumstances not, as already intimated, for the purpose of praise or blame, but that a youthful institution may have sympathy at the period when it is struggling to assume a definite form, and that it may be judged in the light of actual and not imaginary conditions. To say sooth, the public can hardly know too much of the circumstances which determine Festival operations. Ignorance is the fertile parent of error and wrong, and many a time have managers who shroud their doings in darkness been falsely accredited with sins of omission and commission. Take a Bristol case in point. How much remonstrance and censure was aroused by the seeming fact that the committee had shown an utter disregard of English music? Yet, really there was no such fact at all; the truth being that several English composers were invited to submit works for approval, and did so, with the unfortunate result that none were accounted worthy. Why did not the managers set themselves right with the public by letting this be known? It was something to boast of rather than to hide—at least as far as concerned their own intention, and at worst could only have led to the criticism that a composer should be commissioned to prepare a work for performance, and not asked to send his music for approval by judges of whose names he may be ignorant and of whose capacity he can know nothing. All this goes to show the value of a suggestion made years ago, that Festival managers should take the public into their confidence, and reveal not only intentions, but the circumstances which have limited or determined them.

Few Festivals were ever richer in such wealth as flows from exalted patronage than that of Bristol. All the aristocracy of the West was on its side, and a compact body of some 350 guarantors, each pledged to the extent of £25, added practical support to the influence of high-sounding names. But with this I am not greatly concerned here. It gave to the Festival a satisfactory feature, and, by the way, enabled those who liked the exercise to estimate how many local notables in the hundred are content to grant the use of their names for Festival purposes and nothing more. Let me add that a brilliant example of genuine support was furnished by the Mayor of Bristol, Mr. G. W. Edwards. This gentleman proved more than equal to the exigencies of his position, and in deed as well as in name was the first citizen of his city. I cannot tell, because I do not know, the precise difference which the results of the Festival would have shown had the Mayor been content to bestow upon it mere official patronage, nor, perhaps, am I at liberty to make public all the details which have reached me respecting his unexampled munificence. But when it is said that Mr. Edwards entertained at the Mansion House, first the whole of the orchestra, next the leading artists and visitors, and, lastly, the whole of the chorus, it is easy to imagine that he went further in the same liberal spirit. Bristol should be proud, and, I am told, is proud, of such a Mayor, while the musical citizens might be excused for entering into a secret league and covenant to accomplish his election to the office on every Festival year. Coming to the artistic arrangements, it is worthy of note, first of all, that the services of Mr. Charles Hallé and his excellent Manchester orchestra were again secured. I reveal no secret in stating that this was not certain when the managers began their arrangements. Although Mr. Hallé and his band had served the Festival well in 1873, and again in 1876, such opinions were expressed, and with such force, in the councils of the Committee, that negotiations were opened with more than one other Conductor. About the precise reasons for this step outsiders need scarcely trouble. Enough that the managers returned to their first love, and it is hard to see what better they could have done. There may, truly, be special and local reasons for a change, but none of an artistic and general nature suggest themselves to the strongest imagination. Mr. Hallé is an excellent conductor and a first-rate solo pianist; his orchestra, if not the first, is the second in the kingdom, and his judgment on all points connected with music is that of an experienced and conscientious master. What more could Bristol desire? and how strong must be the motives, inconceivable beyond the city walls, which led to steps for a separation from so many advantages! The city supplied its own chorus, as on former occasions; about 350 voices having been ably trained for the purpose by Mr. D. W. Rootham, who succeeded in the post of chorus-master the late and much regretted Alfred Stone. Bristol is fortunate alike in its choral material and in the skill of those who work it up. Though the voices do not possess the sonority observable in places further north, they are singularly excellent in quality and refined in character; while Mr. Stone was, and judging by results Mr. Rootham is, able to bring them to the highest pitch of training. Assuredly, a better chorus than that of the late Festival it would be unreasonable to expect under the most favourable circumstances. As to the principal singers it will suffice to mention their names. They were Madame Albani, Miss Emma Thurs·y, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. R. Hilton, and Mr. Santley—a fair and goodly company, not unworthy of comparison with those of past times. On the whole, the executive resources of the Festival were competent to the doing of anything well, the best proof of which is that among the things done very well indeed was Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

Dropping the question of English music with a reference to what has been already said, it is hard to find fault with the programme. From a strictly artistic point of view one might of course complain that two out of the four Morning Concerts were devoted to the "Messiah" and "Elijah"—works certain of sufficient hearing at other than Festival times. In the ideal Festival of the future these oratorios will receive no more than a fair share of attention, since the object then sought will be the spread of musical knowledge and the encouragement of living art rather than the making of money for charities. Towards the perfecting of that ideal we are all at liberty to strive, and though my voice may be "as one crying in the wilderness," I do well to proclaim that music is worth a Festival on its own account, and that such a Festival to be deserving should be gotten up without a limiting and hampering regard for pecuniary results—a state of things easy enough in our powerful and wealthy urban communities. But at present, I am bound to admit, there is little chance of this. The actual musical Festival is a contrivance for raising money, and those in charge of it are obliged to take measures accordingly. This being the case, the "Messiah" and "Elijah" were inevitable at Bristol. The remaining two morning performances concerned themselves with "Samson," Mozart's "Requiem" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," in the choice of which familiar works it is easy to recognise the same dutiful wish to adapt means to end. But while considerations of profit regulated the selection of oratorio, the Evening Concerts were in large measure devoted to artistic purposes, and from them the real interest of the occasion sprang. Usually these concerts are given over to entertainment, and rise little higher than the level of an artist show. As an exception to the rule the Bristol evening performances deserve special honour. At each a work of high importance was presented—first, the "Walpurgis-Night," next, Brahms's "Rinaldo," last, the Choral Symphony; while at each the miscellaneous selections proved the existence of a desire to instruct and elevate as well as to amuse. Take the following list of orchestral compositions by way of example: The Overtures to "Euryanthe," "Anacreon," and "Ruy Blas"; the Preludes to Acts 1 and 3 of "Lohengrin"; Beethoven's fifth Pianoforte Concerto; Schubert's

Symphonic fragment in B minor; a selection from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," the "Scotch" Symphony of Mendelssohn, and a Gavotte and Musette by Raff, for pianoforte and orchestra. Genuine music like this, in such large proportion, raised the Evening Concerts to full Festival rank, and gave them a character of which Bristol had reason to be proud. Still greater cause for congratulation arose out of the fact that the classical programmes frightened nobody, the Hall being as well filled on each occasion as other halls are under less exalted auspices. In a twofold respect, therefore, the experience of these evening Concerts was valuable. It showed that considerations of art are not only possible to Festival managers, but free from necessary connection with discontent and disaster.

I may assume that the managers reckoned upon having to contend against bad weather not less than against distressful times. For this there was abundant precedent. In 1873, and again in 1876, the mournful story ran: "The rain it raineth every day, and the wind is never weary." What more likely than more rain and more wind in the October of this phenomenal year, 1879? But lo! the Festival found itself rejoicing in an Indian summer. There may have been "a nipping and an eager air" (though barely enough of that to leave a mark of "Autumn's fiery finger" upon Leigh Woods), but there were also a bright sun and cloudless skies to gladden everybody's heart and attune everybody's temper to Festival pitch. Who shall say how much of the week's success was due to the week's fine weather? It is hard for a man to be festive with mud in the streets, rain in the gutters, mist all around him, and a fog in his throat, even though he be an Englishman, and used to it. The first morning was devoted to "Samson," in the performance of which all the artists above named—Madame Trebelli excepted—took part. Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will hardly expect from me here a disquisition upon Handel's famous oratorio, nor, if offered, would they be slack to resent it as an impertinence. But I may remind them of the just claims of the work upon Festival recognition, and pass easily on to those of other masterpieces from the same pen. Handel was once a name for managers to conjure with, though of late they have grown almost afraid to use the potent formula. I do not see why. The old Saxon master still possesses an Open Sesame to the English heart, and, with proper precautions, his "Belshazzar," or "Theodora," or "Esther," to say nothing of others, would be more welcomed by the public than many a work in modern style by inferior men. Even if the performance of "Samson" at Bristol did no more than bring these facts to mind, it served a good purpose, but it made, also, a deep impression upon a large audience, who felt the dramatic power of Handel's genius not less than the grandeur of his music. The oratorio was remarkably well rendered, neither band or chorus giving cause for reasonable complaint. Mr. Hallé's orchestra, in point of fact, seemed to have improved upon its condition three years before, while the Festival choir showed a just balance of parts—if anything the altos were a trifle weak—a pure and refined quality of voice and a finish of style seldom observed outside small bodies specially trained for unaccompanied vocal music. I have heard choirs with a more majestic ensemble, but can call to mind none that in a greater measure united technical excellence to freshness and purity of tone. The sopranos were especially remarkable, and their singing in the music of Dalilah's attendants resembled that of one voice. Miss Emma Thursby, who took the soprano solos in the first and second parts, sang with customary intelligence, but appeared a little ill at ease with her strange task. On the other hand, Madame Albani's "Let the bright seraphim" (the trumpet obbligato admirably played by Mr. Jaeger), was full of confidence and dash. Madame Patey gave the full charm of her voice and style to the part of Micah, and Mr. McGuckin manfully strove against the difficulties presented by the music of the blind hero. His "Total eclipse," though wanting profound pathos, was a more than respectable achievement, and, if the artist appeared to be overweighted in "Why doth the God of Israel sleep?" he took ample revenge in "Thus when the sun." On the whole Mr. McGuckin came out of a trying ordeal successfully. Mr. Hilton, as Manoah, made his mark in "How willing my paternal love," while Mr. Santley, the representative of Harapha, gave extraordinary dramatic significance to "Honour and arms." Mr. Riseley presided at the organ on this occasion, as throughout the week, and Mr. Hallé conducted, his appearance on the platform being hailed with long and loud applause.

The first Evening Concert drew a fairly large audience, who were regaled at the outset with a number of operatic airs and so forth, the plan of the committee being, with doubtful wisdom, to reserve the chief classical pieces till the last. Upon the selections presented I need not dwell. Enough that they were preceded by the "Euryanthe" overture and followed by the Concerto in E flat of Beethoven, both admirably played, and the latter conducted with care and skill by Mr. Edward Hecht, Mr. Charles Hallé being at the pianoforte. How Mr. Hallé reads the great Concerto every amateur knows, and on this occasion he gave the audience of his very best, excelling as usual in clearness and precision. The good qualities of the orchestra were likewise abundantly manifest, and the entire performance was worthy of its theme. In the second part came Schubert's unfinished Symphony; a few more songs, including Gounod's "Ave Maria," sung by Madame Albani; and the whole of Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis-Night," with Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as soloists. The Schubert music made a deep impression, as always when properly played, the audience listening with profound interest to strains wherein noble sentiment is combined with sweet expression, after a fashion of which Schubert was consummate master. Mendelssohn's bright and picturesque Cantata—the fruit of his enthusiasm when at Rome in the flush of youth and hope—brought the Concert to an appropriate end, and served to display the excellence of the ensemble in a special degree. It will be taken for granted that the principal vocalists did their work well, and no estimate of their merit could far exceed the reality; but the "Walpurgis-Night" is a work, first of all for orchestra and chorus, and orchestra and chorus on this occasion turned the fact to good account. The more dramatic portions, such as "Disperse, ye gallant men," and "Come with torches," were, if anything, better given than the rest, every performer entering, as it seemed, into the vigorous life of the music, drawn thither by its marvellous descriptive power.

"Elijah" attracted its usual crowd on Wednesday morning, the number present (2,069) exceeding that of any audience at either of the previous Festivals. This was the gala day of the week, and if all the amateurs who so accounted it did not, as did one of their number, wish to hear "Elijah" at every Concert, they were supremely pleased with the opportunity of listening to it once. The performance gave deserved satisfaction. As a whole it rendered justice to Mendelssohn's music, notwithstanding one or two slight accidents; while with Madame Albani, Miss Thursby, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley in the principal parts, the success of the solos might have been discounted to any extent. Particulars are uncalled for, either with regard to the work or its execution.

In the evening there was another large audience and another programme of commanding interest, beginning with Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Scotch" Symphony, which, though heard amid the distraction caused by late arrivals, met with a hearty reception. But this work never fails to charm English people, who, as regards the national music of their northern neighbours, are almost more Scotch than the Scotch. The nearer Mendelssohn approaches that national music—and in the Scherzo he touches it—the more our public are pleased. They feel themselves on common ground with the music and the composer, and learn to appreciate the art of both for the sake of the tie thus established. All the movements were capitally played under Mr. Hallé's direction, the Adagio especially being given with perfect taste and expression, to which the violins contributed their full share in the far extended and melodious leading theme Another Mendelssohnian gem—the Psalm, "Hear my Prayer"—followed and excited the liveliest admiration for a beauty that never fades and can never pall. Madame Albani, the soloist, on this occasion, hardly troubled herself to give full effect to the opening passages, which have been rendered by others with more expressive force, but in the final movement, "O for the wings," she felt the influence of the music and rose to the level of its demands. The chorus sang throughout in fine style, and the organ accompaniment was played with great taste and finished skill by Mr. Riseley. I do not object to Mr. Hallé's use of the original version of the Psalm in preference to that with orchestral accompaniment prepared by Mendelssohn for Mr. Joseph Robinson, of Dublin. But it may be well to guard against any assumption that the orchestral score is apocryphal. It undoubtedly came from under the master's hand—a fact proved by abundant testimony—and should have a recognised place among his works. The two "Lohengrin" preludes were another interesting feature in this rich Concert, as was a bold and original setting by Mr. Edward Hecht, of Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade." I need not point out to musicians the difficulties presented by these verses—difficulties of rhythm, of constantly varying expression, and of exciting incident. Mr. Hecht must fairly be credited with having overcome these things, and that in the only possible way, namely, by entering thoroughly into the spirit of the verse, and then giving expression to his feelings without reference to any outside considerations of a limiting or determining nature. Writers of this class of music too often turn from their text to consider what is pleasing or what is readily practicable rather than what is true. But Mr. Hecht has avoided the error, and though by consequence his music is sometimes difficult and occasionally thankless, the spirit of the poem animates every bar. So to speak, one can hear the Balaclava trumpet ring in it, and catch something of the "fierce light of battle," as the proud but sorrowful story unfolds itself. On these accounts the work may be accepted as worthy; for the rest, it should always be in the hands of a choir as capable as that of Bristol. Mr. Hecht conducted in person, and I have reason to believe that he was thoroughly satisfied with the performance of his exacting music. In that satisfaction the audience fully shared. The second part of the Concert began with Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," but was otherwise taken up almost entirely by Brahms's "Rinaldo"—the quasi-novelty of the Festival. It is, perhaps, too much to say that the indifferent reception of this work caused surprise. Brahms's music is never fully revealed either as to meaning or construction at a first hearing; and in "Rinaldo" there are many things that require consideration before they can be apprehended. All the same, however, the managers might easily have given the Cantata a better chance, by the simple process of telling the public what it was about. Goethe's poem assumes a previous acquaintance with Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," apart from which it becomes, as to attendant events and surrounding circumstances, unintelligible; and unintelligible it must have been to the great mass of the Bristol audience, who could form only a vague notion of the story. A few lines of explanation in the book of words would have done immense service to the work by giving its hearers the necessary clue, and I trust that whenever "Rinaldo" is performed again so obvious a precaution will be taken. Amateurs will remember that "Rinaldo" was given at the Crystal Palace two or three seasons ago, and soon after a notice of it appeared in The Musical Times. There is consequently no need for me to deal with the Cantata here as something which has to be introduced. Impressions may, however, be stated, and foremost among these in my own mind is one of dramatic weakness. Connoisseurs who look into "Rinaldo," not with an eye to its music alone, but to its music in relation with the connected story, must begin to doubt whether Brahms possesses the dramatic instinct. Of this we certainly find little trace in his other works, and here, instead of the vivid touches, and the broad and striking characterisation of a composer who goes out of himself and into the heart of the circumstances he illustrates, we find a calm, measured, often involved, expression of what seems to be Brahms's own feelings about the subject. Skilful the music is throughout, sometimes beautiful and sometimes imposing, but the defect I have mentioned is radical and fatal. Indeed, keeping the exigencies of the story in view, one becomes irritated at the profoundly reflective manner in which the incidents are set forth. For minute criticism of the music there is now no space: but its details would amply repay examination even if the result were no more than a warning against vocal crudities which take the heart out of singers, and overloaded scores, amid the intricacies of which the listener's attention becomes first bewildered and then lost. "Rinaldo" was, on the whole, efficiently performed; the music of the hero being taken by Mr. Lloyd, who sang it so well at the Crystal Palace, while both band and chorus showed that the often neglected precaution of complete rehearsal had not been lost sight of.

The works performed on Thursday morning, to another large audience, were the "Requiem" of Mozart and the "Stabat Mater" of Rossini, the soloists in the first being Miss Thursby, Madame Patey, Mr. McGuckin, and Mr. Hilton; in the second, Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The immortal "Requiem" was wonderfully well performed, and made, as always under such circumstances, a deep impression. In particular did the choir cover itself with laurels by singing with exactness, spirit, and expression the difficult "runs" in the opening fugue, and its repetition at the end, leaving absolutely nothing to desire. On their part the soloists gave the lovely "Benedictus"—which, if Süssmayer wrote, must have been dictated by the spirit of Mozart—with perfect taste, and so as to bring out all its beauty. It should be added that in the "Tuba mirum" the opening passage for trombone was extended over that usually taken by the bassoon. This, no doubt, accords with Mozart's intention, which the result completely justified, to my mind. The solo may be, as Professor Macfarren has called it, "inappropriate" for the instrument; but the very strangeness of its effect is its raison d'être. After the sombre splendour and chastened beauty of Mozart's work, Rossini's ornate strains came with great force of contrast. Upon the rendering of the "Stabat" I need not dwell. It gave the principal artists an opportunity of which they made full use, and it obviously excited the audience to a high pitch of admiration. Rarely has the "Quando corpus" been more perfectly executed than by the four eminent singers named above.

The last Evening Concert presented, along with the Choral Symphony, a more liberal allowance of songs and light pieces, amid which the "Ruy Blas" overture, Raff's Gavotte and Musette, and the Serenade, Garden Scene and Dance from Goldmark's Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," preserved the true classic flavour. The Raff selection was played by Mr. Hallé, who again resigned the bâton into Mr. Hecht's competent hands, and met with an irresistible encore. This will surprise nobody who has made acquaintance with this composer's smaller works, and knows how perfect is the charm of many among them. Herr Goldmark's music met with a reception almost equally favourable, and for the same reason. It does not belong to the most exalted form of symphonic art, but one symphony may be in the school of "C minor," and another, with just as much right, in that of the "Pastoral." Herr Goldmark seems to prefer the second category, and is warranted in doing so by success. His Bristol audience would willingly have heard the "Rustic Wedding" pieces over again, so attractive were they made by genuine descriptiveness and grace. That the performance of the Choral Symphony was awaited with interest need not be said, especially as it bore the character of an experiment upon a public fairly representing provincial taste. Both to Mr. Hallé and the Committee credit should be given for venturing upon such a step. It showed great faith in their audience, and implied a really earnest desire to do the best possible, even at a little risk. I am happy to say that the result was all they could have wished. The Symphony came late, in accordance with rule at this Festival, and some persons were no doubt compelled to leave before its conclusion. But the rest sat out the great work to the end, not, as far as I could observe, with patient endurance, but with conscious pleasure. The attitude of the audience, indeed, was most encouraging and gratifying to those who have all along contended for the greater elevation of Festival evening programmes. Of the performance I can speak in terms of high praise. To Mr. Hallé's orchestra every note of the "Choral" is familiar, and the members have been so long accustomed to give the work under the direction of their chief, that its rendering is now marked by singular perfection of detail and unity of thought. It was not surprising to find the orchestra excellent, but, all things considered, the work of the Choir was done astonishingly well. The sopranos again carried off high honours, bringing to a difficult task all needful vigour and skill. Miss Thursby, Madame Patey, Messrs. McGuckin and Santley were the soloists, and these, it is needless to state, completed the merit of the ensemble. Altogether the performance of Beethoven's masterpiece was a success for Bristol amateurs to be thankful for, and will be "writ large" in the record of Festival doings.

Friday, as usual, brought the "Messiah," and the "Messiah" brought a crowded audience, and the crowded audience heard a splendid performance, in which all the artists, save Madame Trebelli, participated; and the splendid performance ended the Festival amid general congratulations. What more need be said of the day's doings?

There remains to add that over £200 was collected at the doors for the medical Charities of the city, which will also benefit, it is said, by a considerable balance of profit on the working of the Festival. This is so far satisfactory; but the main cause for rejoicing lies in a decided artistic success—one which should encourage the Bristol amateurs to close up divisions in their ranks and march shoulder to shoulder in the direction of their common aim. Above all should the permanent Festival machinery be used as far as possible to cultivate public taste in the interval of the triennial celebrations. Much is being done in Bristol to this end, but much more might be done through mutual concession and harmonious agreement. The amateurs of the Western capital know the fable of the bundle of sticks. Let them ponder it.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

It is always a pleasing duty to record success, and the pleasure is enhanced when the success tends to the alleviation of sorrow and distress. This result has been obtained by the recent Festival Services and Concerts held in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund, in Bath and Worcester. These Festivals are the most important that have hitherto been given by this Society, involving as they did considerable expense in travelling and maintaining a choir of about seventy-five voices, from the Monday preceding until the Friday following the Festivals. As announced in our last issue, the opening Service was held in Bath Abbey Church, on September 30, the large church being completely filled, and official sanction being given by the presence of the Mayor in his robes, and a large portion of the Corporation. At the commencement of the Service, as also at the conclusion of the following day's Service, the National Anthem was sung in compliance with the request of the Mayor. The opening Anthem was Croft's "Cry aloud and shout," the Preces and Responses being those of Tallis. The Te Deum and Jubilate were also by Croft, the verses being sung by Masters Ling and Coward and Mr. Birch (Chapel Royal), Messrs. Kenningham and De Lacy (St. Paul's). The Anthem after the third collect was Boyce's "O where shall wisdom," the verses in which were effectively sung by Messrs. Hemsley, Gawthrop and Mills (Wells). The sermon, which was preached by the Rev. Henry White, Chaplain of the Chapel Royal, Savoy, was preceded by Gibbons's "Hosanna," sung as usual on these occasions unaccompanied, and the effect of so fine a body of trained voices was specially noticeable in the rendering of this anthem. At the termination of the very able and earnest address the offertory was collected, and the Service concluded with Goss's "Fear not, O land," the verse in which was sung by Mr. Horscroft. The opening Voluntary was played by Mr. J. K. Pyne, sen., the Organist of the Abbey Church, the Service and concluding Voluntary being played by Mr. C. W. Lavington, Organist of Wells Cathedral. After the Service a public luncheon was given in the Grand Pump Room Hotel, the Rev. Henry White presiding.

On the following day, when the Church was, if possible, more densely crowded, the Mayor and Corporation being again present officially, the Service opened with Stainer's Anthem, "I saw the Lord," the fine climax at the words, "And the house was filled with smoke," being given with great effect. The solo parts were admirably sung by Masters Russell and Grover and Mr. Bell (Westminster Abbey), Mr. Smith (Eton), and Mr. Thornton (St. Paul's). After the Special Psalms, Goss's Thanksgiving Te Deum and Benedictus were sung. The Anthem was Wesley's "Wilderness," the treble solo being very effectively sung by Master Hunt (St. George's Chapel, Windsor); the other solos being excellently rendered by Mr. Schartau (Westminster), Messrs. Kenningham, Thornton, and Horscroft (St. Paul's). This was followed by the Litany, sung to the original music of Tallis. The opportunity of hearing this setting of the Litany sung by so large a choir of picked voices is indeed rare, and its effect was such as will not readily be forgotten.

Mr. Gadsby's pleasing little Anthem, "I will lay me down in peace," written expressly for the Society, was given before the sermon, which on this occasion was eloquently preached by the Bishop of the diocese. In the concluding Anthem, Purcell's "Rejoice in the Lord" (known as the Bell Anthem), the verses were well sung by Messrs. Tyers, Smith, and Millward (Worcester). The Voluntaries, and accompaniments to the whole service, were very effectively played by Mr. J. K. Pyne, jun., Organist of Manchester Cathedral. Mr. Riseley (Organist of Bristol Cathedral), who was to have taken part in these Services and Concerts, was, unfortunately, prevented by illness from attending. The Lessons on each day were read by the Rector, the Rev. Canon Brooke (to whom the thanks of the Society are due for the use of the Church), and the Service was intoned by the Rev. C. E. Hey, Precentor of Bristol Cathedral, whose able assistance was of the greatest possible value, especially in the efficient rendering of Tallis's Litany already alluded to. It only remains to be added that the arrangements for seating the large congregations were admirably carried out, without crowding or confusion, by the churchwardens, sidesmen, and a number of gentlemen who acted as Honorary Secretaries to the Festival, and displayed much zeal and earnestness in contributing towards the general result.

In the evening of the first day a Concert of glees, madrigals, and ballads was given, the spacious and elegant Assembly Rooms being crowded with an enthusiastic audience. Here the choir had the assistance of lady vocalists in the persons of Miss Jessie Jones and Miss Marian McKenzie. The finished singing of the former lady was heard to great advantage in Gounod's popular song "There is a green hill" and in "Something sweet to tell you" (Eaton Faning), while Miss McKenzie (already favourably known in London as the winner of the Parepa Rosa Scholarship in the Royal Academy), who made her début on this occasion, met with the warmest approval of the audience in "The Storm" and Molloy's "Darby and Joan," both of which were redemanded. Encores were also awarded to Mr. Bell in "I fear no foe" (Pinsuti), Mr. Kenningham, in "Come into the garden, Maud," and Mr. Gawthrop (Wells), a very promising tenor, in "The anchor's weighed." Special mention should be made of the admirable part-singing of Messrs. Birch, Hunt, T. Dyson, and Orlando Christian, in Shore's glee "Of a' th' airts," and of members of the Wells Choir in Callcott's "Queen of the Valley." The ever-popular "Three Chafers" met with a vociferous encore. The special feature of the Concert was, as usual on these occasions, the singing of the full choir in the madrigals, "Who shall win my lady fair," "The Silver Swan," "Flora gave me fairest flowers," Bishop's "Now tramp" (solo by Miss Jessie Jones), and "Bold Robin Hood." Most of these would have been readily heard again by the audience, but encores were only in one or two instances acceded to.

On the second day the Concert took place in the afternoon, when the Assembly Rooms were once more well filled. The audience were evidently disposed to hear the most they could of the vocalists, and were again urgent in their demand for encores, but an announcement being made that the Choir would have to leave Bath for Worcester by an early evening train, the encores were, except in one instance, not persisted in. The demand for the repetition of Mackenzie's admirable humorous Part-song, "The Franklyn's Dogge," excellently sung by Messrs. Birch, Stilliard, Thornton, Hunt, Horscroft, and De Lacy, could not, however, be denied. Miss Jessie Jones was again successful in "Orpheus with his lute," and Molloy's "Little Shepherdess," and Miss McKenzie's excellent voice and clear enunciation were effectively employed in Barnby's "When the tide comes in" and the "Bailiff's Daughter of Islington." Mr. Bell, in "Hybrias the Cretan," Mr. Kenningham in "The Message," Mr. Thornton in "O say not woman's heart is bought," and Mr. Kempton in "Rage, thou angry storm," met with the unanimous approval of the audience. The Worcester Choir gave a very efficient rendering of "O, by rivers," and the Windsor Choir, Messrs. Stilliard, T. Dyson, T. Hunt, and H. Barnby, created a marked impression in Horsley's "By Celia's arbour." A graceful compliment was paid to the veteran organist of the Abbey Church, Mr. J. K. Pyne, in the selection of his glee "When the pearly dews," which, effectively sung by the Wells choir and accompanied by the composer, was very warmly applauded. The singing of the full choir in the madrigals "My bonny lass," "Fire, fire my heart," "In going to my lonely bed," and in Macfarren's part-song "The Sands o' Dee," again met with the utmost favour. We must add that the madrigals on both occasions have rarely received fuller justice at the Society's Concerts, and a word of special commendation is due to Mr. J. A. Birch (of the Chapel Royal, St. James's) for his efficient and unobtrusive conducting. The accompaniments at both Concerts were ably played by Mr. C. W. Lavington and Mr. J. K. Pyne, jun. We are unable at present to state precisely the exact pecuniary results of this Festival, as we believe that there are some donations still to be collected, but we understand that the total receipts of offertories, donations, and concerts will exceed £400. Satisfactory as this result is, it is still more so to learn that the effect of such musical Services in Bath is likely to create an earnest desire for more warmth and heartiness in the rendering of the ordinary Services, and if this should be the case, the Choir Benevolent Fund and the city of Bath will have been of mutual advantage to each other.

The Service at Worcester Cathedral took place on the afternoon of the 2nd ult., and was to have been a repetition of the previous day's programme, with the alteration of the Canticles and omission of the Litany. The sudden and unexpected death of the Dean of Worcester, which took place just before the commencement of the Service (and not, as it has been erroneously stated, at the moment when the choir was singing "I will lay me down in peace"), necessitated however some slight change in the arrangements, no Anthem having been sung before the sermon, and Mr. Gadsby's "I will lay me down in peace," serving as the concluding Anthem, Purcell's "Rejoice in the Lord" being omitted on account of its jubilant character.

The Cantate and Deus misereatur were sung to the music of Attwood in D, the verses being taken by Masters Russell and Grover (Westminster), Mr. Jones (Bristol), Mr. Hunt and Mr. Dyson (Windsor), and Mr. Christian (Eton). The solos in Dr. Wesley's "Wilderness" were on this day sung by Master Hunt (Windsor), Mr. Smith (Eton), Mr. Gawthrop (Wells), and Messrs. Thornton and Kempton (St. Paul's). The service was intoned by the Rev. E. V. Hall, Precentor of Worcester, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Henry White, who made touching allusion to the sad event which had just taken place. At the conclusion of the sermon the offertory was collected by the Cathedral clergy and a number of influential gentlemen. The "Dead March" in "Saul" was played as the choir and congregation left the Cathedral. Mr. Jekyll (Organist of the Chapel Royal), in whose favour Mr. Done courteously vacated his position, and Mr. Garton (Assistant-Organist at Worcester Cathedral), presided at the Organ, the Service being accompanied on the organ in the choir, and the Voluntaries being played on the larger one in the transept. The nave of the Cathedral was completely filled by the large congregation assembled.

In the evening a Concert was given in the Music Hall, the programme of the previous day being repeated with one or two alterations, and with much the same success. Mr. Pyne's glee was omitted, and in its place "The Franklyn's Dogge" was again given with great effect, the singers on this occasion being Messrs. Stilliard, Thornton, Kenningham, Crick, Kempton, and Horscroft. Mr. Taylor (Wells) was successful in his rendering of Pinsuti's "I fear no foe," and Miss Jessie Jones and Miss McKenzie were again received with marked favour, the latter lady confirming the impression made by her at Bath. Owing to the unfortunate occurrence already recorded, a number of seats which would otherwise have been filled were vacant, but there was still a very good audience. We believe that in Worcester, as in Bath, there are donations still to be received, so that we are unable to give an exact report of the financial result, but we understand that the receipts will reach nearly £200, making a total for the three days of about £600. This result is most encouraging, and we must not conclude our report without a word of commendation to Mr. J. Gleaves, of Wells, the local Secretary for the Bath Festival, and Mr. W. M. Dyson, the local Secretary for Worcester, for the result to which their efforts have in no small degree contributed.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Mr. Mapleson's autumn season of Italian Opera at reduced prices commenced on the 18th ult., with every prospect of unqualified success. On the principle of submitting to the general public the same attractive entertainment which has been so long reserved for the exclusive few, the lessee has wisely refrained from introducing any novelty, and well-worn Operas have therefore been presented every evening. Some changes in the cast of these works have however taken place, Madame Marie Roze on the opening night appearing as the heroine in Verdi's "Aïda," for the first time in England, and creating so marked an effect, both by her singing and acting, as to ensure for this Opera a reception scarcely warranted by the worth of the music. Signor Pantaleoni repeated his somewhat unequal performance of Amonasro; and Signor Frapolli, although overweighted by the intensely dramatic portions of the music of Radames, was deservedly applauded in many of the less exacting solos. "Carmen" continues to draw large audiences. Of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk's inimitable performance in this work there is no need now to speak; but a good word is due to Mdlle. Lido, who made a decided impression upon the audience by her careful and intelligent rendering of the music of Michaela. The part of Don José was fairly sustained by Signor Tecchi, and the well-known Bull-fighter's song was so well sung by Signor Pantaleoni as to elicit an encore. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska received a cordial welcome on her return, after an absence of four years, in her favourite character of Dinorah; and although we cannot say that her voice does not show signs of the ravages of time, her executive power has in no respect deteriorated. The Shadow song was especially well given, the latter portion being repeated by universal desire. Madame Pisani was very successful in the Goatherd's song at the beginning of the second act, and received much and well-deserved applause. Mdlle. Minnie Hauk's assumption of the character of Carmen, in Bizet's opera, has so thoroughly identified her with the part that it was wise policy to show the public that she was almost equally good as the heroine of Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," the salient points of which she brought out with inimitable effect. It is true that wherever deep feeling was demanded she failed to carry her audience with her; but she had evidently earnestly studied the part, and one great merit in her performance was that it was completely free from any imitation of her predecessors. Of the new Lotario, Mr. Conly, we shall prefer to speak when the nervousness consequent on a first appearance shall have worn off. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska's Filina was in every respect satisfactory; and Madame Trebelli, as usual, gave much interest to the small part of Federico. Mr. John Hill conducted the Opera with commendable care and precision.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

Immediately upon the termination of Messrs. Gatti's season of Promenade Concerts, a series of the same class of entertainment commenced under the direction of M. Rivière. The arrangements made for these Concerts were on the most extensive scale, and the attendances must have fully realised the Director's most sanguine expectations. Amongst the vocalists who have appeared may be mentioned Miss Emma Thursby, Madame Mary Cummings, Mdlle. Hamakers, Miss Hélène Greiffenhagen, Mrs. Weldon, Madame Enriquez, Signor Ghilberti, Signor Carrion, &c.; and the instrumentalists have included Madame Viard-Louis and Miss Bessie Richards (pianoforte), Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (violin), and M. Van Biene (violoncello). Many of the programmes have been well selected; but, considering that the compositions of the best masters have been mixed up with such effusions as Jullien's "British Army Quadrille," with "all the original effects," and that the taste of the promenaders is still consulted at the expense of the musical portion of the audience, any criticism upon the efforts of the artists we have named can scarcely be called for.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The present series of Saturday Concerts was resumed on the 4th ult. The opening Concert was signalised by the first appearance in England of a young violinist, Maurice Dengremont, who was born in Brazil, of Belgian parents. This lad, who is only in his thirteenth year, is unquestionably a remarkable musical genius. To a technique which may be described as all but absolutely perfect, he unites an artistic feeling rare indeed in a boy of his age. The work which he selected for his first appearance—Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto—is one which requires for its adequate rendering far more than mere mechanical dexterity; but young Master Dengremont showed himself fully equal to all its demands. The slow movement was given with genuine feeling, and the finale with a brilliancy which justly excited the enthusiasm of the audience. Unless, as too often happens with juvenile prodigies, an extraordinary boy becomes a very ordinary man, Maurice Dengremont has a great future before him. It is earnestly to be hoped that his powers will not be unduly forced. In a solo by Léonard, "Souvenir de Haydn," which he played later in the Concert, the young violinist again displayed his extraordinary execution. M. Delibes' very pretty, if not specially original, ballet-music to "Sylvia" was the novelty at this Concert. Originally intended for the stage, the composer has adapted it for the concert room. It is full of pleasing melody, and excellently scored. The other instrumental pieces were Schumann's Symphony in B flat, and the "Zauberflöte" overture, both admirably played. Miss Emma Thursby was the vocalist.

Hofmann's "Frithjof" Symphony, which was performed for the first time in England at the second Concert (the 11th ult.) is a work which enjoys considerable popularity in Germany. It is founded on a popular Norse subject; but excepting that the four movements bear respectively the titles "Frithjof and Ingeborg," "Ingeborg's Lament," "The Fairies of the Lights and the Giants of the Frost," and "Frithjof's Return," the Symphony has little in common with what is generally known as programme-music. The composer gives us no further clue to the elucidation of his meaning than is contained in the headings just quoted; and the work is in the ordinary symphonic form, and may therefore be judged as abstract music. As such, it has much to recommend it. It is full of pleasing melody, the workmanship is excellent, and the orchestration effective. Very original it cannot be called; it clearly shows traces of the influence of Raff and Schumann, absolute reminiscences of the latter composer being sometimes noticeable. The reception of the work, which was admirably played under Mr. Manns's direction, was unmistakeably favourable, each movement being warmly applauded. Madame Montigny-Rémaury gave an excellent reading of Beethoven's first Concerto, and joined Miss Marie Wurm in Saint-Saëns's brilliant and effective variations for two pianos on a Theme by Beethoven. Bennett's overture to "Paradise and the Peri," Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," and vocal music by Mrs. Osgood, completed the selection at this Concert.

On the 18th ult. Haydn's Symphony in E flat (No. 8 of the "Salomon Set") was given for the first time at these Concerts. The work is one of the largest in design and the finest in the skill with which the subjects are developed of the many that Haydn has left us. It need hardly be said that it received full justice in performance. Madame Montigny-Rémaury was again the solo pianist at this Concert, playing Schumann's Concerto with great finish, though the work is less suited to her style than many others in which she has been heard. A Scherzo by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, of Edinburgh, originally written for the Choral Union Concerts in that city, was given for the first time at Sydenham. The work shows decided ability on the part of the composer, but it would gain materially by judicious curtailment; the orchestration is also in parts too thick, clearness being sacrificed to multiplicity of detail. Miss Annie Marriott, a pupil of the National Training School for Music, gave a fine performance of Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster," besides joining Signor Foli in the duet "Se la vita," from "Semiramide." The gentleman gave as his solo the well-known "Se il rigor," from "La Juive." The overture to "Melusina" concluded the Concert.

Last Saturday, the 25th, a remarkably fine performance of Schumann's great Symphony in C (No. 1) was one of the special features of the Concert. There is no place where Schumann's orchestral works are to be heard to such advantage as at the Crystal Palace; and the Symphony given on this occasion, by many considered the finest of the four, has probably never been better rendered. A novelty on this afternoon was an Allegro for violin and orchestra by Beethoven, performed for the first time in this country. In its original form it is a mere fragment, which has been completed for concert use by Herr Hellmesberger, of Vienna. The style proves it to be an early work of no more than historical interest. It was played to perfection by Mr. Carrodus, who also gave the Andante and Rondo from Molique's Concerto in A minor in excellent style. The other instrumental pieces were the popular Gavotte from Thomas's "Mignon," and some light and pleasing ballet music, "Dance of the Hours," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Madame Schuch-Proska, of Dresden, made her first appearance at these Concerts; her singing of the "O zitt're nicht," from the "Zauberflöte," and "Je suis Titania," from "Mignon," proved her to be an artist of a high order.

CONCERT AT THE BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The Committee of this Institute, already distinguished by their enterprise in establishing Saturday Organ Recitals, at which many of the leading Organists of the day perform to large and appreciative audiences, have now interested a wider circle of musicians by the production, on Monday, the 27th ult., of two secular Cantatas, by J. S. Bach. Not many English musicians can claim acquaintance with these interesting works, and if inherent peculiarities did not place the authorship beyond dispute, a little incredulity as to their genuineness might be excused. We cannot now minutely describe them, but it is safe to point out that much really charming music, of a popular, straightforward kind is to be found in these Cantatas. One is called "The Coffee Cantata," and the plot consists of an amusing dialogue between Leissgen and her father, Scheldrian, in which the daughter declares that she will sacrifice every joy and comfort so long as coffee is allowed her. But the alternative of a husband makes her recant, although afterwards the marriage articles expressly stipulate that coffee is to be permitted. Some of the airs in this Cantata are tuneful and effective, and the final chorus, although a curious setting of the words, has some interesting points. The second Cantata ("The Peasants") is more rustic and occasionally pastoral. The introductory instrumental movements are exceedingly quaint and pretty, and the choruses and many of the airs, founded as they undoubtedly appear to be, upon Volkslieder, are often taking, and surprisingly modern in effect. The Cantatas were performed at the suggestion of Mr. Samuel Reay, of Newark-on-Trent, and the translations into English have been done by this gentleman and Mrs. Newton. The Choir of the Bow and Bromley Institute, under Mr. W. G. McNaught, A.R.A.M., sang the Choruses, and the Solos were sung by Mrs. Daglish (soprano), Mr. Sidney Tower (tenor), and Mr. Frederic King (bass). A small band, strings and flute, under the leadership of Mr. Geo. Palmer, with Mr. Reay at the pianoforte, played the accompaniments. The performance on the whole was a fair one, if we except some brief misunderstandings almost inevitably arising when strange manuscript music is performed without frequent rehearsal. Some of the repeats might with advantage be cut at future performances. Mrs. Daglish sang with good taste and feeling, although she, in common with the other soloists, seemed to be slightly weighted with the unfamiliarity of the music. Mr. A. P. Vivian played the flute obbligato parts, with particular skill and taste. The other items of the programme embraced glees and part-songs and miscellaneous songs.

WE are indebted to a correspondent for the following account of recent musical events in Calcutta:—A series of Pianoforte Recitals has lately been given here, the executant being Herr W. Mack, a long established resident, respected alike for his artistic talent as for his social qualities. Herr Mack graduated in the Conservatoire of Naples under Mercadante, and also under Signor Paolo Serras, at present the distinguished head of his profession in that place. The programmes of all the concerts contained only high-class works, and were selected with much care and judgment. Herr Mack's execution of these compositions elicited universal admiration, his performance being remarkable for clearness of touch and a due observance of light and shade. At the conclusion of the last Recital Herr Mack was presented with a numerously-signed address, accompanied by a gold-chased goblet of Cashmere manufacture, with a salver bearing an inscription. An Opera composed by Herr Mack, entitled "Giovanna Gray," was produced with success at the Calcutta Opera-house a few years ago. His compositions for the voice and for the piano are of a particularly graceful character. It may be added that an amateur performance of "H.M.S. Pinafore," by members of the Saturday Club, under Herr Mack's direction, has created a furore here, the Opera-house having been crammed on two occasions, upon the latter of which all the seats were engaged before the performance was advertised. The second of these representations was for the benefit of Herr Mack, who received an enthusiastic ovation.

ON the 27th of September, at the Lecture Hall, Great Ormond Street, Mr. T. E. H. Bullen gave a lecture on the Chevé Method of teaching music, showing the working of the system from the commencement. The lecturer began by explaining that this method cultivated the intelligence rather than the memory of pupils. The only thing taught by pattern, therefore, was the diatonic scale in stepwise succession. From that elementary acquirement all musical skill was built up by simple and scientific means, which could not fail to make persons of ordinary ability perfect readers of music. This process was very fully illustrated; the facility of the singer in taking difficult minor phrases causing some astonishment. He then showed how all chromatic and modulating passages may be sung at sight with any pattern from the teacher, and illustrated the special means of teaching the staff notation. Having explained that the method attached great importance to musical dictation, a hymn tune, selected by one of the audience, was taken down correctly at the first attempt. This was much applauded. In replying to a vote of thanks for his lecture, Mr. Bullen stated that he was willing to instruct teachers in the Chevé Method, free of expense, and he invited any persons interested in the subject to communicate with him by letter at 28, Warwick Lane. As an instance of the success of the Chevé Method in teaching the Staff Notation, he stated that out of 26 children from one school, recently sent up to the Trinity College Examination, 19 took honours.

Of the above-named, Messrs. Alcock, Carnell, Hutchinson, Palmer, Seal, and Sidebotham were admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Music, by the Rev. Dr. Evans, Vice-Chancellor, in a congregation held on the 23rd ult.

THE first statutary meeting of the shareholders of the Coffee Music Halls' Company, Limited, was held at 136, Seymour Place, on the 24th ult. The Right Hon. W. Cowper Temple, Mr. Hodgson Pratt, Mr. F. D. Mocatta, Mr. Carl Rosa, and other leading shareholders expressed in writing their regret at not being able to attend, and their great interest in the undertaking. The adoption of the Report was moved by Mr. H. M. Pope, barrister, and seconded by Dr. Norman Kerr. It stated that the preliminary expenses were merely nominal. Upwards of £1,000 of shares had been applied for, without any expenditure in advertisements. Negotiations were in progress for opening more than one large music hall. Capital of £10,000 was the minimum with which operations could be commenced. The Directors had the advantage of the countenance and aid of eminent and experienced leaders in musical and theatrical entertainments, as well as persons well-known as the friends of social progress. The report was carried; a vote of thanks to Miss Cons and Miss Bell, who had worked hard as honorary secretaries, was moved by Mr. W. Shaw and seconded by the Rev. W. Panckridge. A vote of thanks was moved by Mr. S. Francis and seconded by Mr. Hoole, to Mr. Guest Hart, who occupied the chair. With this the meeting closed.

THE Harvest Festival was held in the church of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, on the 1st ult., when large congregations attended. At the first service a choral celebration took place, the music of which was very creditably performed, Mr. Frank Dunand presiding at the organ. The solo parts in Gounod's Benedictus and Agutter's Agnus Dei were specially well sung by two of the chorister boys. At the mid-day service Barnby's Te Deum in B flat was sung, and after the sermon the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The evening service was more elaborate, and consisted of a processional hymn by Mr. Gee, "We march to victory"; Versicles (Tallis), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (King in F); anthems, "O taste and see that the Lord is good" (Henry Westrop), and "The Lord is loving unto every man." The service concluded with the "Hallelujah" Chorus (Handel) and a retrocessional hymn. The choir sang in a highly creditable manner, and showed signs of very careful training. Mr. C. E. Tutill (the Choirmaster) conducted the services, and Mr. Jopp (in the absence of Miss Kate Westrop, the present Organist, who, owing to a family bereavement, was unable to play) was the Organist.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society's ninety-second monthly Concert was given on Friday, the 17th ult., at the Grosvenor Hall, the first part of the programme, devoted to the works of Sir Henry Bishop, including "The Tramp Chorus," "The chough and crow," "Sleep, gentle lady," and "Where art thou, beam of light" (all of which were well sung by the choir); the Round, "When the wind blows," the Sestett, "Oh! bold Robin Hood," and the Trio, "Maiden fair, a word I pray." The solo vocalists were Miss G. Hemming, Miss Flora Perry, Miss Kate Reed, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. W. Lloyd, and Miss Nellie Dakin, the latter contributing the song, "Lo! here the gentle lark." In the second part, Mr. Spencer West gave a flute solo with much success. Miss Nellie Dakin sang Mr. J. H. Maunder's new song, "Little maiden, cease thy moaning," for which she received an enthusiastic encore. The choir gave with spirit Pearsall's "Who shall win," Molloy's "Song of the Triton," and Purcell's "Come, if you dare." Mr. Henry Baker conducted, as usual.

THE prospectus of the Belfast Philharmonic Society announces the first Concert of the present season on the 25th inst., the principal work selected for performance being Gade's "Crusaders," with Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Herr Henschel as the principal vocalists. On January 10, 1880, Madame Ilma di Murska, Madame Marie Roze, Mdlle. Darialli, Signori Tecchi and Susini, Mr. Carleton, etc., will appear; and the following compositions are advertised to be given during the season: Goetz's "Nœnia," Spohr's "How lovely are Thy dwellings," S. Wesley's "In exitu Israel," Henry Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and "Dettingen Te Deum," and Dr. F. Hiller's "Song of Victory," or Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The Conductor will be Sir Robert Stewart, Mus.D. An amateur Concert, which was given on the 1st ult., in aid of the funds of the Society, was highly successful, both in an artistic and pecuniary sense.

A REISSUE is announced to appear next month of the well-known "Pointed Psalter and Canticles," edited by Sir F. Ouseley and Dr. E. G. Monk. Some years have elapsed since the first production of this work, during which church music has made extraordinary progress; while the practice of chanting, in particular, has become the general rule, even in village churches, instead of, as formerly, the rare exception. The Editors have therefore wisely undertaken the careful revision and improvement of their several works. This will be seen in the introduction of additional accents and marks of expression, intended to ensure a more intelligent rendering of the psalms, as well as by the increased number and variety of the chants appropriated to the daily psalms and to the canticles. To those who prefer the single chant as a satisfactory vehicle for choir and congregational chanting, the forthcoming revised editions of this widely accepted work cannot fail to be welcome.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society, held on Tuesday, the 21st ult., it was decided that, as the Directors of Exeter Hall were now in a position to continue the Society's tenancy of the Hall, their Concerts should be continued as heretofore. The opening Concert of the forty-eighth season will therefore take place early in the present month. The committee understand that the building will not be available for Musical purposes after October next; and the Concerts of the season 1879-80, will therefore be the final series given by the Society in Exeter Hall. The following works are selected for performance during the season: Handel's "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," and "Judas Maccabæus"; Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "St. Paul," and "Hymn of Praise"; Spohr's "Last Judgment," Haydn's "Creation," Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," and Costa's "Eli."

AT S. Luke's Church, Berwick Street, W., the Harvest Festival was celebrated on the 5th ult., when the following Services and Anthems were well rendered: Morning, Service in C, by Dr. Boyce; and in the evening, Service in C, by Ebdon, "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn), and Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works." On the 19th ult. the Dedication Festival was celebrated by Young's Morning Service, and the Offertory "Lay not up for yourselves treasure on earth" (Casson). In the evening, as in the Harvest Festival, Ebdon's Service was used; "As pants the hart" (Spohr), and the "Hallelujah" Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." "Onward, Christian soldiers," was the processional hymn, and "The Church's one foundation" the recessional. The choir throughout these services evidenced the effect of good and careful training.

MR. HENRY WESTROP, who died on September 23, at the age of sixty-seven, was a musician of more than ordinary talent, and a prolific composer, although his works are but little known save to his brother artists. Mr. Charles E. Stephens has addressed a letter to us (for which we much regret we cannot find room) calling attention to the worth of his many compositions, and expressing surprise that "such a man should have lived, and worked, and died in our very midst without the slightest recognition by certain musical societies, institutions and coteries which profess so much." We well recollect the effect made by several of his works at the "Society of British Musicians"; and cannot but share Mr. Stephens's surprise at the manner in which English music has been allowed by English musicians to be interred with the Society which was formed to foster it.

A CHORAL Festival was given in Finsbury Chapel on Tuesday, the 7th ult., with considerable success. The programme comprised two voluntaries, played by Mr. Walter W. Robinson, organist of Unity Church; hymns, quartetts, anthems, and selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Handel, Haydn, &c. The soloists were Miss Flora Perry, Mrs. Garment, Miss S. Swanton, and Madame Arnold Potter; and the choir was assisted by ladies and gentlemen from several prominent musical societies. The quartetts, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" and "God is a Spirit," were given with great taste and precision by Mrs. Garment, Madame Potter, Mr. P. McAuslane, and Mr. Theo Potter. Miss Nelly Hoe ably presided at the pianoforte, and the Concert was under the conductorship of Mr. W. G. Balcarras.

THE Dumfries Philharmonic Society announces three public performances in the Mechanics' Hall during the season 1879-80. The first Concert (to be given some time in the present month) will consist of Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio, "Eli," Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Thurley Beale being the principal vocalists. In January or February there will be a Shakespearian concert, the music consisting of the songs introduced in Shakespeare's plays by various composers, and also of music illustrative of the plays. In April Handel's Cantata "Acis and Galatea" will be given, followed by a miscellaneous second part. As the vocal and instrumental talent engaged at these Concerts will depend, it is said, upon the amount of subscriptions received, we trust that the appeal of the Committee will be liberally responded to.

A HARVEST Festival Service took place on Thursday evening, the 9th ult., at St. John's Church, Horselydown, S.E. The musical portion of the service consisted of those popular hymns (from "Hymns Ancient and Modern") 223, 224, 360; Festival responses (Tallis), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Tours in F), anthem "Fear not, O land" (Goss), and a selection from Haydn's "Creation." The solos were finely sung by Mrs. Jarratt, R.A.M., Mr. J. Doyle, and Mr. George Trotman. The choir on this occasion numbered over sixty voices. Mr. M. Bridge (Choirmaster) officiated as Conductor, and Mr. Jarratt, R.A.M., presided at the organ. The church was profusely and tastefully decorated, and every available seat was occupied by a very attentive and devout congregation.

THE Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society announces three Concerts during the season 1879-80, commencing on the 24th inst. At the first (a miscellaneous English Ballad Concert), Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Thurley Beale, are engaged as vocalists; at the second (Handel's "Samson"), Miss Jessie Royd, Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, Messrs. Barton McGuckin, Robert Hilton and D. Harrison; and at the third (Dr. Heap's "Benedictus," Weber's Mass in G, and Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron"), Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Ellen Orridge, Messrs. W. H. Cummings, Redfern Hollins and J. Bridson. Mr. W. C. Stockley is engaged as Conductor and Chorus Master, and Mr. A. H. Mann, Mus. Bac., as accompanist.

MR. H. T. BYWATER announces a series of six Concerts in the Agricultural Hall, Wolverhampton, with the laudable object of raising a fund for the purchase of a new Organ, to be presented to the Wolverhampton and Staffordshire General Hospital. The vocalists engaged are Misses Mary Davies, Marian Williams, Marriott, Jessie Royd, Eleanor Falkner, and Emilie Lloyd; Mesdames Antoinette Sterling and Whitaker, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Orridge; Messrs. Messrs. Shedlock and Lochner have issued a prospectus for a series of Winter Musical Evenings at Lancaster Hall, Lancaster Road, Notting Hill. The instrumental artists engaged are Mr. Henry Holmes and Herr Wiener (violin), Mr. W. H. Hann (viola), M. Lasserre and Herr Daubert (violoncello), Madame Frickenhaus, Miss Nancy Evans, and Mr. J. S. Shedlock (pianoforte), Mr. Russell Lochner (organ), and Messrs. E. Shute, Russell Lochner, and E. H. Birch, B.Mus. (accompanists). The vocalists are Miss Damian, Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, Miss Kathleen Grant, Messrs. Frank Ward, Alfred Kenningham, and Thurley Beale. The first of the four Concerts to be given was announced for the 29th ult.

Mr. J. S. Watson announces four Subscription Concerts at the Cambridge Hall, Southport, at all of which the most eminent artists will appear. At the first Concert (on the 28th ult.), Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Thurley Beale, and Santley were advertised; at the second, on December 2, Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé, and Miss Mary Davies; at the third, on February 6, 1880, Mr. J. H. Mapleson's Italian Opera Company; and at the fourth, on March 9, Madame Edith Wynne and Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra are engaged. Such excellent concerts deserve the cordial sympathy and support of all interested in the progress of healthy music.

The new session of classes and lectures in the Faculties of Music and Art at Trinity College, London, was inaugurated on the 13th ult. by an eloquent address from the Rev. the Warden, delivered in the lecture room of the College. The room was crowded with the students and their friends. The diplomas and higher certificates awarded at the last half-yearly examinations were afterwards presented; two ladies being for the first time admitted to the diploma of Associate in Music, and several taking preliminary certificates as "students. On the motion of Dr. Westbrook, seconded by Prof. E. M. Lott, a vote of thanks was accorded to the Warden for his address.

The Harvest Festival at St. Peter's Church, Great Windmill Street, was held on Sunday, the 19th ult., the preachers being, morning, the Rev. H. Belcher, LL.D., evening, the Rev. A. Mozley, M.A. In the evening Tours's Service in F, and Dr. Stainer's anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land," together with appropriate hymns, were sung, the choir being augmented for the occasion. The church, which was profusely and appropriately decorated, was crowded, and the musical portion of the services was most successfully rendered. Mr. A. Dorey, organist of the church, efficiently presided at the organ.

Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was performed at Christ Church, Clapham, on Thursday, the 16th ult., with orchestral accompaniment, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the organist and director of the choir. The band and choir were very efficient, and the Cantata was exceedingly well rendered, the treble solos being especially well sung by Master Ward, the solo boy of the choir. The choruses went with much spirit and precision. Mr. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., presided at the organ. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Tours's setting in F.

The Church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, was re-opened after repairs and improvements on Sunday, the 19th ult. Hummel's Mass in B flat was sung at the morning service, and after evensong Haydn's "Creation" was given with full orchestral accompaniment. The rendering of the Oratorio was very successful, and the church was crowded. On the 26th ult. the Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held, when Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung, also with orchestra. Spohr's "Last Judgment" was announced to be given on the 2nd inst. The whole of the music is under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

On Wednesday, the 1st ult., an Organ Recital was given at Mare Street Baptist Chapel, Hackney, by Mr. W. T. Best (of Liverpool), on the occasion of the re-opening of the Organ recently rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. Hill and Son. The programme was an excellent and varied one, selected from works by Bach, Smart, Loewe, Silas, Best, Widor, and Salomè. The instrument contains thirteen stops on the great organ, ten on the swell, and two on the pedal. In addition to the Organ performances, Mrs. W. West sang three solos, accompanied by Mr. Best, which gave much satisfaction.

The series of Free Concerts recently given at Birmingham by the mayor, Alderman Jesse Collings, has already led to a movement having for its object the establishment of cheap musical entertainments for the people. A meeting was held in Birmingham on the 4th ult., when the subject was fully discussed, and a resolution passed to the effect that "it was desirable to promote the general study of music in the town, and to provide for its performance under conditions which will make it easily available as a source of enjoyment to all classes of the community." The details of this enterprise were referred to a committee.

Madame Worrell gave a highly successful Concert at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Wednesday evening, the 1st ult. The bénéficiaire, who elicited the warmest manifestations of approval from a large audience, was assisted by Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Annie Mathews (pupil of Madame Worrell), Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, and Miss Marian Burton; Messrs. A. J. Thompson, Alfred Caink, Edward Wharton, James Budd, J. H. Maunder, Thomas Nettleship, and Henry Baker. Miss Ada Hazard, R.A.M., contributed three pianoforte solos, and Mr. Turle Lee conducted.

We regret that the pressure upon our space will not allow of our inserting Professor Macfarren's address to the students of the Royal Academy of Music at the commencement of the present term. So earnest an essay, not only on the true means of acquiring the principles of music, but upon music itself in its highest aspect, deserves to be preserved; and we sincerely hope that the pupils of the institution who listened to their Principal's eloquent remarks will not only profit by them during their studentship, but carry the spirit of them as an unerring guide into the world of art.

A notice in the Saturday Musical Review of the 18th ult. informs its readers that the weekly issue of the journal ceases with that number, in accordance with the decision of the executors of the late proprietor, Mr. Metzler. Mr. Charles Mackeson, who has for many years been its editor, will continue in that position; and the paper (henceforth to be called by its former name, The Choir, and issued monthly) will become his sole property. We trust that every success may attend the venture of a writer who has so long proved himself an earnest as well as an energetic fellow-labourer in the cause of musical art.

Messrs. C. Kegan Paul and Co. announce the publication of a volume of Tennyson's songs, the music written by Sir J. Benedict, Sir H. Oakeley, Ch. Gounod, Arthur Sullivan, J. Barnby, J. F. Barnett, Ciro Pinsuti, H. Leslie, G. Henschel, J. Joachim, J. Raff, J. L. Hatton, G. A. Macfarren, J. Blumenthal, A. Randegger, C. Saint-Saëns, C. Villiers Stanford, J. Massenet, W. H. Cummings, F. Liszt, &c., &c. Mr. W. G. Cusins is the editor, and also a contributor, and the work includes many favourite compositions, as well as a number of new settings by the above-named composers.

A Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at S. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, on Sunday, the 19th ult., when the sermon was preached by the Rector, the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Bedford. In the morning Attwood's Service in F, and Wareing's anthem, "Sing praises to God," were sung; and in the evening the Service was Bayley in F, and the anthem, "Fear not, O land" (Goss), the "Hallelujah" Chorus being sung at the conclusion of the service. Mrs. Stirling Bridge presided at the organ, and Mr. Faulkner Leigh conducted.

At St. Mary's, Tothill Fields, the annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were celebrated on Sunday, the 19th ult., when the music included, at Matins, Smart's Service in F, Gadsby's anthem, "O Lord, our Governour," and at the Offertory, Sauerbrey's "Not every one that saith unto Me," and "Lay not up for yourselves"; at Evensong, Dr. Stainer's Service in A, and Mozart's "Glorious is Thy name," from the Twelfth Mass. The music throughout was remarkably well rendered. The church was tastefully decorated.

A Special Service was held in St. Stephen's Church, North Bow, on Thursday, the 2nd ult., after which an Organ Recital was given by Mr. E. A. Price, organist of the church. The choir, numbering fifty voices, rendered very effectively the anthems and choruses, and the psalms were chanted with precision and clearness. A collection was made in aid of the organ completion fund. The choir, organist, and choirmaster (Mr. E. Stroud) deserve support in their united endeavours to improve the singing in the Church of St. Stephen, North Bow.

The sixth season of Mr. Edward J. Spark's Concerts at the Music Hall, Worcester, is announced to commence on the 4th inst., when Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé will appear. The second Concert (which will be orchestral, and under the direction of Herr Carl Meyder), takes place on December 23, and the third in January, 1880. As first-class talent is engaged at these concerts, and the rate of subscription is extremely moderate, it is to be hoped that Mr. Spark may meet with all the patronage he so thoroughly deserves.

A handsome Concert-hall, well adapted for the performance of chamber and high-class music, has been added by Messrs. Neumeyer and Co., the Berlin pianoforte makers, to the suite of show-rooms and warehouses lately opened by them at Bloomsbury Mansion, Hart Street, W.C. Besides the show-rooms, which are very elegantly and tastefully appointed, the establishment includes a music-publishing department, and a room especially devoted to visitors, in which they may write letters, &c., a great convenience to country customers.

The Oratorios at the evening service at St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, continue to attract crowded congregations. There have been given during the past month the "Hymn of Praise," "St. Paul," "Messiah," and "Elijah;" and for the coming month "The Last Judgment," "Requiem" (Mozart), "Stabat Mater," "Lauda Sion," and the "Hymn of Praise" are announced. The works are rendered in an excellent manner by a thoroughly efficient band and chorus.

On the 31st ult., an organ of three rows of keys, by Messrs. Hill and Son, was announced to be opened at Leamington Parish Church by Sir Herbert Oakeley. Festival services in connection with this inauguration are to be held on the 2nd inst., when Sir F. Gore Ouseley is to preach, and to preside at the organ at an evening service. Handel's "Messiah" is to be given on the 5th and 6th inst., with a chorus of 200 voices, and the Misses Robertson, Mr. H. Guy, and Mr. Santley as soloists.

The Eleventh Season of Mr. Henry Charles Jerrard's Choral Reunions is announced to commence on the 4th inst. The object of these meetings is the cultivation of part-singing; and as the works of the best composers are selected for practice, and the subscription is extremely moderate, there can be little doubt that they will continue to receive the patronage they deserve. The class meets weekly at Mr. Dunkley's Music Room, High Street, Clapham.

The prospectus of the Sherborne Musical Union announces for study during the coming season Handel's secular Oratorio "Semele," which has very rarely been heard; Hermann Goetz's Cantata "Nœnia," and a new Idyll, called "Sylvia," by Mr. Louis N. Parker, the indefatigable Conductor of the Union. We warmly reciprocate the wish of the retiring Committee that "the present prosperity of the Society will be fully maintained during the ensuing season."

A Concert in connection with the Bermondsey Working Men's Institute was given in the Boys' Schoolroom, Star Corner, on the 21st ult. The vocalists were Miss May Lennox, Miss Flora Hastings, Miss Mary Horton (who possesses a fine contralto voice), Messrs. Stedman, J. Child, and F. Ward; pianist and accompanist, Mr. King Hall. The various items in the programme, which was of a popular character, were very successful with the audience.

A Concert took place at the Birkbeck Institution on the 15th ult. under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The artists were Madame Emma Beasley, Miss Giulia Welmi, Miss Hebe Barlow (a pupil of Mdlle. Rudersdorff, who made a very successful first appearance), Miss Kate Baxter, Messrs Stedman, John Child, and Oswald; M. Buziau (violin), and Mr. H. Parker (solo pianoforte). There was a large audience, to whom the programme gave much satisfaction.

A Musical Performance by the blind pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read was given at the Institution, Upper Avenue Road, Regent's Park, on the 17th ult., the Rev. Henry Geary, M.A., in the chair. The programme was, as usual, excellently arranged; and a feature in the selection was an anthem, "The Lord is my Shepherd," a composition by the son of the indefatigable Conductor of the Society, Mr. Edwin Barnes, which was well rendered and much appreciated.

Harvest Festival was celebrated at All Saints' Church, South Lambeth, on Friday evening, the 3rd ult. The choral portion of the service was generally well treated, and consisted of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis from G. M. Garrett's service in D, the new harvest anthem, "Sing praises to God," by H. W. Warsing, and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus. Mr. W. H. Holmes presided at the organ.

The Islington Choral Society gave a performance of Bradbury's Sacred Cantata "Esther," at Windsor Street Chapel, Islington, on the 13th ult. The proceeds were devoted to the benefit of the Conductor, Mr. George Randal, who is about to leave the country for New Zealand. He has been the Conductor to the Society for upwards of three years, during which time it has prospered very much. His position is about to be filled by Mr. George Hibbard.

Mr. George Shinn (Organist of St. Matthew's, Brixton), gave a Recital on the Organ, recently opened by Mr. R. Septimus Alder, at the Walworth Wesleyan Chapel, on the 4th ult. The programme was well selected, and all the pieces were listened to with much attention. The instrument is giving great satisfaction; the tone and quality of the stops, especially the "Voix Céleste," "Viol di Gamba," and "Harmonic Flute" are of great beauty.

The first of the second weekly series of Organ Recitals at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, took place on Saturday evening, the 4th ult., when Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the instrument. The following Recital was given by Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., who, besides other works, executed two of his own compositions, "Tenor Melody" and "Offertoire" (MSS.) The performances were listened to with much interest by large audiences.

The first of a series of Monday Evening Concerts of popular Vocal Music, to be given at the Polytechnic, under the direction of Mr. Stedman, took place on the 27th ult., when Miss Helena Grieffenhagen, Madame Joyce Maas, Mr. Sandham, Mr. Gerard Coventry, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. Stedman's Choir of Boys appeared. Mr. R. T. Gibbons, F.C.O., was the accompanist.

We regret to announce the sudden death of the Rev. H. C. de St. Croix, Vicar of Figheldean, near Salisbury, which took place on the 17th ult. The deceased was well-known as the Honorary Secretary to the Salisbury Diocesan Choral Association.

The grand organ for St. Mary's, Edinburgh, which Cathedral was consecrated on the 30th ult., contains four manuals and about sixty stops, and was built, from a specification by Sir Herbert Oakeley, by Messrs. Henry Willis and Co.

We are informed that Messrs. Brown, Morrell and Co. (late Oxenham's), of Oxford Street, will sell the whole of the plates and copyrights of Mr. H. D'Alcorn, Music Publisher, of Poland Street, Oxford Street, on December 2, 3, and 4, at their Rooms.

A series of Concerts, similar to those given last year, are arranged to take place in November, December, and January at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, under the direction of Mr. Faulkner Leigh.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
The Violin. By Berthold Tours.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

There is probably no instrument which presents such difficulties to the learner as the violin, nor one which requires so much practice for its thorough mastery. It is perhaps needless to add that it would be all but hopeless for any one to attempt to learn it by means of an instruction book alone; nor do we for a moment suppose that Mr. Tours intends his Primer as a substitute for a good teacher. Nevertheless the work of the master is much lightened if he have a good text-book whereon to base his oral teaching.

Mr. Tours, who was a pupil of the late Ferdinand David, has followed in this work the general outline of the method adopted by his master. His judgment in this respect is unimpeachable; for David's "Violin School" is one of the best, if not the very best, tutor for the instrument in existence.

After a description of the various parts of the violin, Mr. Tours gives particularly clear instructions as to the manner of holding the instrument, the method of bowing, and the attitude of the performer; these points being illustrated by eight excellent figures. A few pages are then devoted to the names and values of notes and rests. These might perhaps have been dispensed with, as we think there are few, if any, who commence the study of the violin without at least some knowledge of the rudiments of music. So little space, however, is allotted to these matters that we are not disposed to complain. We then reach the first exercises. These are for the open strings only; for the first difficulty which a beginner encounters is that of ensuring his bow touching the right strings. When this has been mastered, the fingers are brought into use one by one for stopping the notes. Mr. Tours, we are glad to see, insists on the necessity for keeping the fingers on the strings in playing scale passages; and the holding down of the fingers is carefully marked throughout these earlier exercises. After a series of exercises on the various intervals, from seconds up to octaves, the author gives eighteen melodious exercises, all in the key of C, with an accompaniment to be played by the master. The advantages of this method, as regards developing both correctness of ear and a feeling for time, are obvious. A very useful study (No. 43) follows, in which a simple passage of ascending and descending thirds is bowed in twelve different ways. We next find the whole of the major and minor scales given through the compass of one octave; the chromatic scale concludes the first section of the book.

In Part II. various gradations of tone are for the first time introduced, and illustrated by various exercises. These little pieces, which, like those in the first part, are duets for master and pupil, are not only most improving, but far more interesting as music than many studies. Such numbers as 50, 51, 61, 62, will afford real pleasure to the learner. We may remark in passing that Mr. Tours adopts the excellent modern fashion of discarding entirely the old signature for common time, marking always either 2-2 or 4-4, according as he wishes minims or crotchets to be counted. It is to be hoped that this method of indicating common time will soon be universally introduced. Exercises for the various kinds of ornaments (appoggiaturas, turns, shakes, &c.) conclude the second part. The third part deals chiefly with the various methods of bowing, which are very clearly explained, and illustrated by exercises at least as interesting as those which have preceded them. The subjects of double-stopping, arpeggio, and pizzicato are also included in this part.

Hitherto the whole of the exercises have been in the "first position." The upper positions are treated of in the appendix. Twenty pages only are given to this important subject; but it must be remembered that the present book is not a Violin School, but only a Primer; and it would have been impossible to go fully into the matter without either unduly enlarging the size of the work, or passing in too cursory a manner over the very important elementary instructions of the earlier parts. We think, therefore, that Mr. Tours has exercised a wise discretion in giving pupils a thorough insight into the first position, and in dismissing the others with more brevity. One point has occurred to us in going through this appendix. No mention is made of the "half-position." It is true we find it incidentally given (p. 43) as an alternative fingering for the scale of G sharp minor; but it might have been well to refer to it again in this place. The subject of harmonics is naturally only touched upon; so advanced a branch of violin-playing hardly comes within the scope of an elementary treatise.

In our notice of Mr. Tours's book we have thought it best to give an epitome of its contents, and to let them speak for themselves. We will only add, in conclusion, that we think the Primer quite worthy of the series of which it forms a part.

The Works of G. F. Handel. Part 27. Chamber Music.
[Printed for the German Handel Society, Leipzig.]

The great edition of the works of Handel, to which reference has previously been made in these columns, is now approaching completion. Sixty-four parts have already appeared, including the large majority of the oratorios, the whole of the miscellaneous sacred music, most of the secular cantatas, twenty-four of the operas, and the greater part of the instrumental works; and it is, we believe, confidently expected that the entire works of the composer will be published by the year 1885—the bi-centenary of his birth. The present edition differs from all that have preceded it, not only in containing a large number of works which have not been previously published, but in giving many which have already appeared in a far more complete form than that to be found in earlier editions. As instances may be named the score of "Israel in Egypt" with the composer's original trombone parts, that of "Saul" with Handel's complete indications of the organ part, the warlike Symphony in the second part of "Joshua," and the final Choruses to the second and third parts of "Belshazzar," all of which were new to musicians. The volume now before us presents some very interesting pieces now published for the first time.

It cannot, of course, be maintained that Handel's instrumental music will at all stand on the same level with his great oratorios. In the very nature of things this is impossible. The development of the modern orchestra, and of the form of the Sonata and Symphony by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven has caused the older forms to become almost, if not altogether, obsolete. When Handel wrote, the Symphony, as we now know it, had no existence; the Suite was its predecessor and its then representative; and most of Handel's instrumental works, whether entitled Sonatas, Trios, or Concertos, bear more or less relation to the Suites. In these days the Suite is no longer employed as a vehicle for musical thought, unless the composer wishes to write in the antique style. The interest, therefore, which is awakened by such music as this of Handel's is to a considerable extent, though by no means entirely, historical, not to say antiquarian.

The present volume contains the whole of Handel's chamber music which has come down to us. We first find fifteen solo Sonatas for flute, oboe, or violin, with a figured bass for the harpsichord. These in modern nomenclature would probably be called duets, as the harpsichord, though it only has the accompaniment, is of considerable importance in all the pieces; but Dr. Chrysander in his preface mentions a curious anomaly, viz.—that while a composition for two violins and a figured bass was called a Trio, one for a single violin with a figured bass was called not a Duo but a Solo. It should be added that both works would also be entitled "Sonatas"—at that time a vague name as regards form, and applied to almost any extended piece of instrumental music other than a Suite.

The first works in this volume are fifteen Sonatas or Solos, of which six are for violin, seven for flute, and two for oboe, with an accompaniment for harpsichord. That the latter instrument was obbligato is proved not only by the figured bass, but also by the fact that in some cases (e.g. in No. 5) passages are found for the harpsichord alone. With the exception of the Sonata in A, No. 3, which has been often played by Herr Joachim, Mr. Henry Holmes, and other violinists, this series of solos is almost entirely unknown. According to his usual custom, Handel has borrowed from himself, and arranged various movements from other works. Thus, the finale of the second Sonata is founded on that of the third Organ Concerto, while No. 11 is merely an arrangement as a solo for flute of the fifth Organ Concerto. In No. 13 (now printed for the first time), we find a very interesting movement founded on the subjects afterwards used for the Fugue in "From the censer" (Solomon).

The six Sonatas for two oboes and bass which come next in the volume have a special musical interest, as being beyond a doubt the earliest known works of Handel. They were written about 1696, when the composer was eleven years of age, and are now printed for the first time from a manuscript copy in the library of Buckingham Palace. Their interest is mainly historical; they are antiquated in style, but the contrapuntal skill shown in them proves that Handel as a boy was in precocity of genius but little behind Mozart.

The two sets of Trios (Ops. 2 and 5) which complete the present collection had been for the most part previously published by Walsh, and they are also included in Arnold's edition of Handel, though they are here supplemented by some numbers not before printed. To a large extent they are compilations from other works, and were probably written rather to meet the requirements of publishers than from any desire of production on the part of the composer. Thus in Op. 2, No. 4 contains the greater part of the Overture to "Esther," with the first movement of the second Organ Concerto for a finale; while in Op. 5 we find in No. 1 the Overture to the Chandos Anthem, "I will magnify Thee"; in No. 2 the Overture to the "Jubilate"; in No. 4 that to "Athalia"; in No. 5 the Fugue in E minor from the first set of "Suite de Pièces," with some slight alterations, and transposed into G minor; while in No. 7 the Fugue is taken from the Overture to the Chandos Anthem, "O sing unto the Lord a new song," and the final minuet from the air "Lascia la spina," in the second version of "Il Trionfo del Tempo." In most of these Sonatas short movements, such as Bourrées, Gavottes, &c., are added to complete the work; but a large portion of the matter contained in them is, as will be seen from what has been said, put together from other sources.

Songs. Composed by St. Vincent Jervis. 2 vols. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT has often been truly remarked that if an author had written fewer books he would have written better. Unquestionably the same observation will apply to many composers who, emboldened by a name which has been made by one or two lucky hits, produce such multitudes of works as to weaken a fame which, with a due amount of reticence, might have been solid and enduring. To compose a large number of vocal or instrumental pieces requires only ordinary talent; but to compose one good one requires genius. With every desire to do the utmost justice to the musical merits of the two volumes of songs before us, we cannot but think that had Mr. Jervis concentrated his whole attention upon the composition of only two or three of the numbers contained in the collection he has given us, his success would have been infinitely greater. The gift of musical facility, like the gift of a good voice, often leads its possessor to ignore the necessity of hard study and rigid self-examination before appealing to the public; and many, therefore, who fail to secure a permanent position have only themselves to blame for the result. That Mr. Jervis is open to receive good advice we infer from the facts of his publishing these compositions at a house which will certainly secure for them the utmost publicity, and courting criticism upon their value by sending them for review; if, therefore, we temper our praise for his clever workmanship with a few well-meant remarks for his guidance in the future, we feel convinced that he will receive them in good part. In vol. i. we are struck by some very good writing throughout the four sacred pieces which commence the book. Psalm xxvii. (verses 8, 10, 11.) may be cited as an exceedingly sympathetic setting of the text. The voice part is vocal and melodious, the harmonies appropriate and not overladen, and several figures in the accompaniment give much vitality to the composition. Psalm xliii. (verses 5 and 6) contains also some good points; but why are only five flats placed at the signature? Surely the composition is in E flat minor, and to mark the C flat every time a phrase is in the key seems an extraordinary misapplication of an accidental. "O Domine Deus" is the most original of all the sacred pieces; the constant recurrence of the phrase for the left hand in the opening symphony gives much character to the composition, and the words are throughout well and earnestly expressed. Of the eight secular songs we may select for especial commendation "As down in the sunless retreats" (to Thomas Moore's words), the persistent triplet accompaniment to which is effectively preserved throughout; "On a Mother and Child sleeping"—a melodious and appropriately placid composition; and the "Song of the Outcast," which evidences some dramatic power, but is crude in parts. The songs in the second are perhaps scarcely equal to those in the first volume; but there is much to praise in "Would I were with thee"—a simple, but effective little composition; "It is not much that I would seek"—which, although containing a happy theme, is perhaps a little overelaborated in the accompaniment; "Come away, come away, Death,"—a fair setting of some words from Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night"; and "The Maiden at her Spinning-wheel,"—a pretty little story, well told both in poetry and music. We presume that Mr. Jervis is an amateur; but his compositions show that he has been a careful student, and that he has but to restrain his natural facility to become a successful composer.

Stephen Heller's Pianoforte Studies. New and complete edition, progressively arranged by Lindsay Sloper. In twenty books. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THOSE who make teaching an art cannot too strongly insist upon the necessity of every pupil being well grounded in elementary principles. The many who commence in the middle spend a large portion of valuable time in trying to reach the end, or in struggling back to the beginning, and rarely, if ever, succeed in doing either. In the acquisition of music, vocal or instrumental, it is of vital importance that the right method shall be ensured in the first instance; and we give a cordial welcome therefore to any works which will contribute towards this desirable object. The Studies of Stephen Heller have been long known to and thoroughly appreciated by all good pianoforte teachers; but we have always been of opinion that a better arrangement as to progressive difficulty might have been effected by the composer. Some attempt to do this has already been made by Herr Hans Schmitt, of Vienna, who wrote out a table of the various studies in the order he would recommend them for practice. As the editor of the work now before us, however, truly remarks, "to make a perfectly graduated study of them, it was necessary to be at once possessed of the entire work, consisting of twenty books." Nothing, then, could be done to remove this objection but to place the work in the hands of an experienced master and rely upon his judgment to put them into the required order, so that the number of the book should indicate the degree of difficulty. This has been effectually accomplished in the edition just published. Mr. Lindsay Sloper, besides being a recognised public pianist, brings a large amount of experience in teaching to his task, and the result is highly satisfactory; for not only are the twenty books excellently classified for the practice of the student, but the books may be purchased separately, "with the security," as the editor tells us in his preface, "that each study therein contained is of about equal mechanical difficulty with the rest." In a previous edition of these studies the composer says: "I have wished to habituate both students and amateurs to execute a piece with the expression, grace, elegance, or energy required by the peculiar character of the composition. More particularly have I endeavoured to awaken in them a feeling for musical rhythm, and a desire for the most exact and complete interpretation of the author's intentions." In justice to Mr. Lindsay Sloper these observations should be borne in mind, lest—as the classification is not strictly according to the mere mechanical difficulty of each study—it might be imagined that his arrangement was faulty. The delicate gradations of touch, so essential to the due performance of these thoughtful little pieces, require to be very carefully studied; and brain-work as well as finger-work must be considered in estimating "difficulty." We have carefully looked over the whole of the twenty books, and most conscientiously award the highest praise to the editor for the manner in which he has discharged a duty which, from his admiration of the Studies and his personal friend ship with their composer, has evidently been a labour of love. The intrinsic musical beauty of all these pieces, as well as their usefulness in forming a refined and intellectual style of performance, should earn for them a world-wide acceptance; and we cannot but believe that, valuable as they have ever been, they will be doubly so in the form now issued to the public.

Franklin Taylor's Pianoforte Tutor. [Enoch and Sons.]

NOTWITHSTANDING the multitude of instruction-books for the pianoforte published in this country within the last few years, Mr. Franklin Taylor may confidently rely upon the wide acceptance of his new Tutor, not only because he has worthily earned his right to be heard as a teacher of the instrument upon which he is so accomplished a performer, but because it is extremely unlikely that he would be desirous of multiplying the number of existing treatises unless he had either something new to say upon the subject or had systematised his code of instructions in a novel form. That the latter of these reasons has influenced him in producing the work we are informed in the preface. "Acting upon the principle," he says, "that all instruction, to be thorough, must be strictly progressive, it has been thought well to depart from the customary method of dividing the whole Tutor into two portions—theoretical and practical—an arrangement which compels the pupil to seek out, in the first part of the work, all the explanations and descriptions which apply to the particular lesson he may be learning, and, instead of this, to combine both theoretical description and practical illustration in such a manner that the pupil may proceed systematically through the whole book, finding nothing in the practical exercises which has not previously been explained, and nothing in the explanatory text which does not receive immediate practical application." This is an excellent theory, and excellently is it carried out; every rule being so ably illustrated by example as materially to smooth the path of the little traveller through the pages of the work. The notes are taught just as gradually as they should be; the position at the instrument is clearly defined; the construction of the scales is carefully explained, and all the musical lessons are interesting and well suited for their purpose. We certainly regret that Mr. Taylor has not boldly combated the principle of following the major scale by its "relative," instead of its "tonic" minor. Professor Macfarren, in his recently published book on Counterpoint, truly says, speaking of the inaccurate signature of the minor form of a key, "This system for ages held back the progress of music by obscuring, if not totally hiding, the natural principles on which music is based, and which constitute the science that furnishes the materials with which the artist works." With this we perfectly agree; and as an instance of the false ideas engendered by the conventional method of teaching, we may mention that, in our own presence, a young pupil who played the chord of G major and was requested to make it minor, without the slightest hesitation, struck the chord of E minor, that (as she afterwards said) being her only notion of the connection between major and minor. A good feature in this book, however, is the appearance of the "harmonic" as well as the "melodic" minor scale. There is no doubt that students should be urged to practise both, for we can scarcely wonder that a pupil should puzzle over a minor scale with the minor sixth and major seventh in a piece, when in her "Instruction-book" no such progression of intervals can be found. In conclusion, we may say that the finger exercises at the end of the book are exceedingly good; and we are certain that if the author's directions are implicitly followed, the basis of a sound musical education will be laid by the aid of this Tutor.

Inventions. Six Two-part Pieces for the Pianoforte. By Ferdinand Hiller. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THE "Inventions" of Bach have effected so much good in training young pupils for that close part-playing so essential to acquire before attempting to perform classical works of any elaboration, that we can scarcely wonder at Herr Hiller's desire to multiply exercises founded upon so excellent a model. Pure two-part writing is as good practice for the executive as for the creative artist, and teachers owe a deep debt of gratitude to the composer of these modern "Inventions" for presenting them with a set of pieces so carefully adapted for the purpose of tuition. No. 1, in E minor, has a flowing subject well suited for imitation; No. 2, in G major, is a good study for bold and marked playing; No. 3, in G flat major, has a flowing theme in 6-8 time; No. 4, in B minor, with some contrasted touches for the two hands, demands a true and careful finger throughout; No. 5, in A minor, abounds in rapid semiquaver passages; and No. 6, in E major, will be found highly useful for cultivating a sympathetic touch between the hands, the legato quavers running almost through the piece in two parts. We sincerely hope that this group of thoughtful studies by so eminent a writer will receive the attention they unquestionably merit.

Billet Doux. Rendezvous en Bois. Silhouettes pour le Piano.

Nosegay. The Doll's Royal Wedding March. In the Meadow. Three pieces for the Piano.

Composed by L. Samson. [Neumeyer and Co.]

TRIFLES of this sort, written for the young ladies who in drawing-rooms are asked to "play something," may, as a rule, be dismissed with scant courtesy. But Mr. Samson's pieces are an exception, because something better and higher than a melody over which arpeggios and scales have been sprinkled as from a pepper-box. Each little movement, while simple and quite unpretending, strives at perfection in its way, and, if we cannot admire every bar, a good many pages call forth honest praise. The "Rendezvous en Bois" is a case in point. No doubt it would please just as well by any other name, since the connection of music with such an idea as that here expressed must needs be arbitrary, but the work displays none the less grace of style, in combination with a mode of utterance which, while not laboured, avoids commonplace. "In the Meadow" belongs to the same category, and is written, here and there, with decided freedom. Let us add that all the pieces are adapted for use, not only by adults who have risen above the cheap glory of arpeggios and scales, but by children whose taste careful educators would keep pure till the time comes for their initiation into the higher mysteries of the art.

The Waterfall on the Exe. Song. Words by the Rev. F. Tilney Bassett. Music by the Rev. J. Munro Tate. [Enoch and Sons.]

As a rule we find that amateur vocal composers may be divided into two classes, the first consisting of those who, feeling themselves gifted by nature for writing melodies, do not think it necessary to study the theoretical portion of the art at all; and the second, of those who dive so deeply into the mazes of harmony that, like most rich men, they are proud of displaying their wealth of knowledge on every opportunity. We do not affirm that there are none who steer the middle course, but the instances are rare; and when we say that the composer of the song before us must be placed in the second of these classes, we are paying him no ill compliment, for his harmonies show that he has mastered many of the difficulties which all students encounter. But he has yet to learn how to be simple. His method of harmonising every note and distressing the voice throughout with a restless accompaniment is one of the worst faults of inexperience. Imagine the words "As foilings deft and mazes thwarting weaves the hunted deer," sung with a quaver to each syllable, a quaver bass, and semiquaver arpeggios in the right hand.

My Love far away. Ballad. The poetry by Maria X. Hayes. Music by M. W. Balfe. [Duff and Stewart.]

ONLY the weary traveller who, after a long journey over the desert, comes suddenly upon a spring of pure water, can imagine how refreshing is a ballad like the one before us to the wanderer through dreary wastes of music-paper. There is character even in the opening symphony, which ending upon the dominant, prolonged for a whole bar, leads with charming effect to the tuneful and simple theme to which the words are wedded. Apart, too, from the excessive beauty of the harmonies, the refined and artistic touches in the accompaniment prove that even on the merest trifles a conscientious author bestows as much attention as upon an elaborate work. The copy before us is in C, and although it is also published in B flat, we cannot believe that the melody a whole tone lower would be so effective, especially as the song does not range above F in what we presume to be the original key.

Idylle, für das Pianoforte. Componirt von Heinrich Stiehl. [W. Marriott and Sons.]

We have before had occasion to speak in high terms of Herr Stiehl's compositions, the least unpretentious of which, apart from their grace and refinement, evidence the hand of a master in their treatment. We have always held the opinion that pianists who wish to play light "drawing-room pieces," as they are termed, need not devote their energies to the flimsy productions of those who possess no power beyond that of writing a few bars of melody, and dressing them up with the fashionable embroidery of the day. In the first place the small works of the great writers are always at hand; and for any who are scared by the names of these composers, there are many, very many, who can shadow forth the classical school, even in the merest sketch, so successfully as to satisfy the musical as well as the unmusical listener. Such a person is the author of the "Idylle" before us, which although perhaps somewhat more conventional than other pieces of the same composer which have come before us, is extremely melodious and effective. It is simple in construction, and the passages lie well under the hand throughout.

Barcarole for Pianoforte. By G. Rossini. [H. D'Alcorn and Co.]

As one of the posthumous works of a composer who could write in almost every style, and who, if not always great, was never absolutely dull, this Barcarole must at least be regarded with much interest. But its authorship will, we are certain, not prove its principal recommendation; for it is both tuneful and full of that life and vigour which characterise all the compositions of this writer. The melodious opening theme, with the flowing quaver accompaniment, is happily expressive of the Gondolier's song; and the simple character of the piece—which, however, contains many brilliant and effective passages—will, we hope, commend it to the attention of a large number of young pianists. The fingering, by Mr. J. W. Lawson, will make it additionally attractive to amateurs; but we cannot understand why, when a good fingering has been written to a passage, another—and much worse—fingering should be placed above or below it.

O Musa! Quartetto. Poesia della "Gerusalemma liberata" di Torquato Tasso. Musica di Clara Angela Macirone. [Lamborn Cock.]

The composer of this Quartett has sufficiently earned her fame to allow of her writing simply without the danger of being accused of a want of power to write learnedly. It is difficult, we know, to produce a work which shall equally please trained and untrained listeners; but Miss Macirone has successfully achieved this task; and we are conferring a benefit upon vocalists by earnestly recommending "O Musa!" to their attention. Apart from the excessive melodiousness of the piece, the harmonies are so rich and yet so natural, and the part-writing so easy and yet so effective, that, whilst giving but a small amount of trouble to well-trained vocalists, it will be certain to create a more favourable impression than many compositions we could name with infinitely greater pretension.

Let Maids be false, so Wine be true. Part-song for Men's Voices. Words by W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac. Composed by George C. Martin, Sub-organist, St. Paul's Cathedral. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This is a well written and extremely effective part-song, the light and playful subject most appropriately colouring the bacchanalian verses. The obstinate repetition of the dominant by the first alto, the theme being taken by the first tenor and bass, instead of by the alto and second tenor as at the commencement, is an extremely effective point. But what means the announcement that the song can be sung by mixed voices? Surely sopranos are not to sing about "rosy wine and ruddy cheeks." If ever there was a part-song exclusively adapted for male voices, this is one.

There sits a bird on yonder tree. Song, words from the "Ingoldsby Legends." Music by A. C. Mackenzie. [Weekes and Co.]

The composer of this attractive song is rapidly making a name in this country; and indeed we have never yet seen a work from his pen which does not evidence the result not only of a creative power, but of that care and attention to minute details which is absolutely necessary to sustain a reputation, however well earned. It may be inferred, therefore, that the vocal and melodious character of this setting of Ingoldsby's words is by no means its sole recommendation. The harmonies are excellent throughout, and the constantly varying and appropriate accompaniment give a vitality and freshness to the composition which cannot be overpraised.

Christabel. Glee for four voices (A.T.T.B.). Poetry by Robert Crompton. Composed by Stephen S. Stratton. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This part-song, composed for, and dedicated to, four members of the Orpheus "First Prize" Quartett, Huddersfield, is a highly favourable specimen of Mr. Stratton's powers, the melody expressing the words with remarkable fidelity, and the part-writing being easy and fluent throughout. We are especially pleased with the manner in which the line "O Nature! who hath marr'd thy scheme," is treated, the repetition of the word "who" between the first tenor and bass giving much force to the phrase. If well sung this spirited glee could scarcely fail to prove effective.

Tarantelle, for the Pianoforte. By Stephen Jarvis. [B. Williams.]

There must always be a certain family likeness in Tarantelles; but Mr. Jarvis has written a spirited and effective piece, which may be made extremely attractive by a nimble pianist. The principal theme, in A minor, goes very well in the tonic major, and the Coda is sufficiently brilliant to satisfy those performers who desire to produce much effect with little effort.

Give unto the Lord. An Anthem composed by Alfred Alexander. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This anthem is well and correctly written, and upon the whole, is a fairly satisfactory composition. It displays little or no originality, either with regard to melody or general treatment, but the first and last choruses are certainly vigorous and well-developed. The duet, for treble and tenor, which forms the middle movement, is tolerably interesting, but we fail to see any special connection between the music and the sentiment contained in the words.

Twenty Celebrated Marches. Arranged for the Organ, with Pedal Obbligato, by Dr. Spark. [Metzler and Co.]

This is an excellent collection of Marches, and will, no doubt, soon be well-known to many an organist. Well-nigh all the popular marches by classical composers are included in this collection, and being both easily and effectively arranged, they will prove acceptable to all who have occasion to use this style of music.

Overture in E minor, and Offertorio in F minor for the Organ. By Giovanni Morandi. [Edizioni Ricordi.]

These compositions are only suited for the very lightest of purposes. Properly scored, they would be very effective if played during stage performances, or on like occasions. To us this music has a very saddening effect, coming as it does from the land which was at one time the cradle of all artistic forms.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The principal feature of interest in continental musical life during the past month has been the resumption of performances on the part of nearly all the leading concert institutions in France, Germany, and elsewhere. Thus the season of 1879-80 may be said to have commenced in earnest, for it is in the concert-room rather than in the opera-house where the musical activity of a nation finds its most genuine expression. At Paris, both the Châtelet Concerts, conducted by M. Colonne, and the Concerts Populaires, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, recommenced on the 19th ult. The last-named energetic chef-d'orchestre, encouraged by the signal success obtained by the revival last season of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," intends during the coming winter to produce the same composer's music to "La Prise de Troie," an opera which has as yet never been performed. M. Pasdeloup also promises to persist in his performances of the "Lohengrin" music which have hitherto proved so distasteful to a noisy portion of his audiences. Berlin now possesses three institutions devoted to the performance of orchestral works, viz., the Sinfoniecapelle, the Concerts conducted by Herr Bilse, and the recently introduced Popular Concerts directed by Herr Julius Liebig; and it remains to be seen whether the existing musical element in the Prussian capital is sufficient to sustain the new undertaking by the side of its two long-established rivals. The Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, of world-wide reputation, commenced on the 9th ult. Among the numerous similar German institutions we will only instance the so-called "Gürzenich Concerts" of Cologne, under the direction of that veteran artist Ferdinand Hiller, which on the 21st ult. opened their new season, in the course of which the following artists have, among others, promised to co-operate: Mesdames Clara Schumann, Norman-Néruda, MM. Johannes Brahms, Joseph Joachim, Anton Rubinstein, and Charles Gounod.

In the operatic world scarcely an event of particular interest can be related, unless it be the complete discomfiture of the Maestro Grafigna, who recently produced at the Brunetti Theatre of Bologna an opera, entitled "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," consisting partly of Rossini's music with "embellishments" and additions from the pen of the maestro referred to. A journal, in mentioning the fact, expressively adds that the hissing of the audience was so persistent and universal as to resemble the long-continued sounding of the danger-signal of a railway-engine. A theatre has been opened at Dresden for the performance of operetta. The inauguration of two magnificent theatres, which will be partly devoted to operatic representations, has also taken place last month at Bordeaux and Geneva. The building at the town last mentioned is the result of the munificent bequest of the eccentric Duke Charles of Brunswick, and was opened with a performance of Rossini's "Tell." Two interesting revivals at the Berlin Opera may be referred to, viz., Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Schumann's "Genoveva." Speaking of the latter, the Berlin Echo says: "Genoveva" belongs to the class of operas which are heard to better advantage a second time. When once we have overcome our feeling of disappointment in the opera as an effective dramatic whole, we can give ourselves over to the enjoyment of the beautiful detail-work which it contains." Wagner's "Meistersinger," has also been recently produced at Wiesbaden, amidst the greatest enthusiasm of the audience. In a letter of thanks addressed to the conductor of the Hof-Theater, Herr Jahns, the "Meister," alludes to the great difficulties presented by the work, which, he adds, can only be successfully surmounted by the loving devotion on the part of all concerned in its rendering. The recent performances of the Nibelungen-Tetralogy at Vienna, having proved so successful, the cyclus will be again included in the répertoire during the present season. Meanwhile, by way of recreation after the fatiguing effects wrought by Wagnerian music, the artists of the Viennese opera are busily engaged in the rehearsals for the forthcoming historical performances of Mozart's operas already announced in our last number.

M. Gounod, whose new opera "Le Tribut de Zamora" was to have been produced at the Grand-Opéra during the current season, has sought and obtained the permission of M. Vaucorbeil to withdraw the work for the present, on the ground of important alterations and emendations having suggested themselves. On the other hand, the Director of the Paris Opéra has obtained the right, which had been withheld from his predecessor, M. Halanzier, to the performance of Verdi's "Aïda," which is now in course of preparation at the leading French operatic establishment.

At Brussels a new tenor has made his début in "La Favorita," who until recently had been a lieutenant in the Belgian army. Some time ago he was, by ministerial order, attached to the War Department at Brussels, in order to enable him to undergo a course of study at the Conservatoire, and has since exchanged military service for the stage. The Queen of the Belgians was present on the occasion of his first appearance at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, which resulted in a most unqualified success for the young ex-lieutenant, whose name is M. Masart.

The performances of the Paris Opéra-Comique recommenced on the 11th ult. with Hérold's "Le Pré aux Clercs," since when, among other operatic works, Félicien David's "Lalla-Roukh" has been produced, in which the newly acquired tenor, M. Mouliérat made his début.

An innovation which is about to be introduced at the Théâtre de la Renaissance of Paris, might be imitated with advantage by our own theatrical managers. The director of the Renaissance, M. Victor Koning, has, it appears, made the necessary arrangements with the Paris Compagnie des Petites Voitures by which the visitor to his theatre is enabled to ensure upon taking his ticket, or previous to the last entr'acte, the service of a vehicle, the number of which is furnished him, at the conclusion of the performance. The innovation is a most beneficial one to the public, and its announcement in a musical journal needs no excuse, considering the anti-artistic effect frequently produced upon the mind of the amateur who, after having "supped with the gods," finds himself suddenly transferred into the company of the "gentlemen of the pavement" competing for the goodwill of a solitary cabman.

Mdlle. Nicolo Isouard, a daughter of the composer of "Joconde," and herself a musician, has just founded an annual prize at the Académie des Beaux-Arts of Paris, to be accorded to compositions excelling in melodiousness.

Madame Erard has presented the Paris Opéra with a splendid six-octave pianoforte, the instrument deriving its special value from the fact of its having been formerly in the possession of Spontini.

The Viennese pianist, Herr Bonawitz, has recently given three concerts at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, during which he performed, entirely from memory, fifteen of Beethoven's Sonatas appertaining to the three recognised "periods" of the great master. The audience is said to have been much impressed by this extraordinary tour de force, but the opinions of the press are divided as to the artistic rendering of the works in question.

It is rumoured that Hans von Bülow and Jean Becker have been asked by the Belgian Government to fill the posts vacated by MM. Louis Brassin and Vieuxtemps respectively, at the Brussels Conservatoire.

The committee of the "Deutscher Sängerbund" having some time ago opened a competition for the composition of songs, no less than 733 candidates have sent in their contributions. Out of this number eight Lieder have been selected by the jury, and will be embodied in the collection of the association.

The Viennese municipal authorities have passed a resolution in accordance with which the monuments erected over the graves of Mozart, Gluck, Haydn, and Beethoven will be ornamented with a continual supply of flowers at the expense of the municipality.

Madame Christine Nilsson will take part in the festive performances at Madrid during the approaching celebration of the marriage of King Alfonso. The diva, it is stated, will receive the sum of 90,000 francs for twelve operatic performances.

A statue of Sigismund Thalberg, the world-famed pianist and composer, who died in 1871 at Naples, has just been unveiled at that town. An orchestra of eminent professors, performing some of Thalberg's compositions, took part in the festive proceedings.

We have to record the death, on the 14th ult., of Carl Eckert, the Conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera, and an artist universally esteemed in the musical world. Eckert was born at Potsdam in 1820, the son of a sergeant of Uhlans, and at an early age manifested great proficiency as a pianoforte and violin player. Zelter and Mendelssohn were successively his instructors, and after having made an artistic tournée throughout the Continent, Eckert, in 1852, accompanied Henriette Sontag to America. He eventually became Conductor of the Viennese Opera, which post he filled until the year 1860, when he removed in a similar capacity to Stuttgart. Since the year 1868 Eckert has occupied the position of chief leader of the orchestra of the Berlin Opera, and has been a prominent figure in the musical life of that capital. Among his numerous compositions may be mentioned an opera, "Wilhelm von Oranien," an oratorio, "Judith," a symphony, and several chamber works.

At Milan died Carlo Boniforti, Professor of Harmony and Counterpoint at the Conservatorio of that town.

At Wiesbaden died, on the 14th ult., Carl d'Ester, well-known for his ability as orchestral leader, and energetic Director of the local "Cäcilienverein."

The death is also announced, at Copenhagen, of the Danish composer, Peter Arnold Heise, author of numerous popular songs, as well as of several operas.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE OLD CHROMATIC NOTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In Mr. Hipkins's observations on Herr Carl Engel's clavichord (Musical Times, September, p. 492), he shows that the chromatics introduced by the gebundenes Clavier, the bonded or "fretted" clavichord, represented intervals of about 19 : 18. This corresponds to 94 hundreths of an equal semitone, and on calculating out all the intervals from his measurements (privately sent to me, but not printed in his letter) I came to the same conclusion in a mean of eight cases. Of these four gave 98, 96, 109, 106 hundredths, and I felt that the intention of the maker was to give 97 hundredths, which is exactly half a mean-tone. In this case all the fifths of the series F C G D A E B would be tuned a quarter of a comma too flat, and the major thirds FA, CE, GB would be perfect, and then the chromatics would be introduced half-way between two notes forming a tone, a very obvious contrivance and an important step towards equal temperament, as the scale would thus consist of ten semi-mean-tones and two great semitones. This view is curiously confirmed by a passage which I have just come across in Prætorius's "Syntagma Musicum," 1619, vol. ii., p. 66 (a very rare book, for the loan of which I am indebted to Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, of Edinburgh), which I will translate from the quaint old German. Prætorius had just been describing a clavicymbalum with 19 notes to the octave, which he noted in order of pitch as c c♯ d♭ e e♯ f f♯ g♭ g g♯ a♭ a a♯ b♭ b♮ b♯ tuned perfectly on the mean-tone system, which he himself strictly adopted and explained (ibid., pp. 148-158). This instrument he had examined at the house of Carl Luyton, "imperial composer and organist" at Prague. He calls this "an instrumentum perfectum, si non perfectissimum," and goes on thus:—

"For although on the viols de gamba, and especially on lutes, a motett or madrigal can be played through all its semitones, and consequently the whole genus chromaticum can be produced by a practised and experienced master and lutist, yet it cannot be given so justly and correctly as upon such a clavicymbalum, for these reasons. Because on the viols de gamba and lutes the frets [Bünde or bonds] are all placed at equal distances from one another (of course closer together as they get nearer to the bridge), and consequently the semitones can neither be called greater or less, but rather intermediate. Since to my judgment every fret, band, or stop [Bund, Band, oder Griff] (whatever it may be called) has 4½ divisions, reckoning the major semitone to have 5, and the minor semitone 4 of these divisions."

This, of course, is merely a rough estimation. But the words "placed at equal distances" would really imply an equal temperament, supposing 54 divisions to the octave. I am inclined however to think that Prætorius means the naturals to have been placed in the usual way, and the chromatics to have divided the distances equally. He proceeds thus:—

"And because only half a division is wrong either way, which cannot be estimated by the ear on such instruments as viols and lutes (which have a pleasant quiet quality of tone, lieblich und still), both the major and minor semitone, though played on one fret, seem and sound as if they agreed with both parts, and the difference cannot be so easily observed and apprehended, especially as the player can help the strings by his stopping on the frets, and name and give them (weil man darneben den Säitten mit den Griffen vff den Bünden helffen, nennen und geben kan). [This evidently implies the same tricks of stopping on the frets as are now used by Oriental players to give shades of sounds, and requires that "experience" in a player of which he formerly spoke.] This is quite impossible on the clavicymbalum or organ, where nothing can be added to or subtracted from the strings or pipes, but all must remain as it has been tuned. Hence on such instruments the genus chromaticum cannot be observed and produced without a multiplicity of keys. To have it correctly on lutes the frets must be removed, and you must play without frets."

I may add that Arnold Schlick (1511), in his "Spiegel der Orgelmacher und Organisten" (Mirror of Organbuilders and Organists, reprinted in "Monatshefte für Musik-Geschichte," Berlin, 1869), chapter viii., "On Tuning Organs," directs the fifths to be made as flat as the ear will bear, to bring the major thirds nearly perfect; but when he comes to g♯, he seems to advise halving the interval between g and a, although the major third e g♯, as he says, then becomes imperfect, in fact very sharp. The whole passage (p. 103 of the reprint) is very curious, but too long to quote.

The mean-tone system was suggested by Luigi Fogliano, of Modena; but, as he confined it to making the second of the scale a mean between a major and a minor tone, and left the other intervals unaltered, Zarlino ("Le Istitutioni harmoniche," 1562, p. 128, cap. 43) has no difficulty in proving it to be bad. But Salinas ("De Musica," 1577, p. 164) tells us that he himself completed the system, which from his day till very recently was regularly employed, and indeed may be still heard on some organs in England, as those made by Green at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, St. Katherine's, Regent's Park, and Kew Parish Church, which are also in Handel's pitch and quite accessible. In England equal temperament seems to have been first mooted in 1811, and not seriously carried out till after 1840. In the north of Germany, however, an attempt at equal temperament (which Salinas absolutely ignores) was made at a much earlier period than elsewhere at the close of the seventeenth century, apparently because the pitch of the organs was so high that the organist had constantly to transpose. Herr Schmahl, the organist of the St. Jacobi Kirche at Hamburg, which is tuned a whole tone above French pitch, informs me that Werckmeister, in his "Orgelprobe," 1691-98, strongly combated Prætorius's (that is Salinas's) mean-tone system, and advocated equal temperament; and that the St. Jacobi organ, built by Schnitger, an admirer of Werckmeister, 1688-93, was originally tuned as nearly in equal temperament as was possible by ear, and that probably for that reason it was greatly admired by J. S. Bach, who played upon it in 1720, and often spoke of it with pleasure. Herr Schmahl also says that neither he, who has been organist since 1838, nor his master Demuth (died 1848), who recollected from 1810, ever heard unequal temperament. But some forks which I have just received from Herr Degenhardt, the organist of St. Catherinen Kirche in Hamburg (where the organ is seven-eighths of a tone sharper than French pitch), on which organ Herr Schmahl practised when a learner, show that the A and C have now exactly the relations of mean-tone (or unequal) temperament, so that very possibly this organ may be tuned on the semi-mean-tone plan, explained at the beginning of this letter, and that this organ was not well adjusted formerly to equal temperament appears from Herr Schmahl's letter, in which he says that the tuner Wolfsteller, when Herr Schmahl practised on it, made the usual keys C and G major rather bad, and the keys of F♯ and D♭ the best on the instrument. I may also mention that a set of tuning-forks from the bellfoundry Cavedini, at Verona, more than one hundred years old, which I have examined, give a most frightful scale, with all the fifths slightly sharp, and hence the major thirds sharper than on equal temperament.—Respectfully yours,

October 7, 1879. Alexander J. Ellis.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Can you grant me space for a few comments on Mr. Dickson's most interesting letter in your last issue, in the general feeling of which hundreds of your readers will heartily sympathise. As I read it, the thought constantly occurred to me, Cannot this be effected without such great change? Will not some small adjustment of our present system help us to much that is here sighed for?

Mr. Dickson most rightly lays great stress upon the influence of the conductor. May I remind him that in cathedrals this is provided for by the office which he holds. As I look back into my early days, the vision of dear old Stratton, Precentor of Canterbury, steadying an intricate movement by beating with his Precentor's paper, rises before me. And even where the Precentor shrinks from such demonstrative exercise of his office, his mere presence and eye can do much. If Mr. Dickson will not think me personal, I may say that on leaving Ely Cathedral the last time I heard the service there, I could not help adding, while admiring the quiet steadiness of the choir, "That comes of the presence of a real Precentor." The grand adjustment required is that one and all of our cathedrals should have such real Precentor, and that that real Precentor should have real power and control over all things musical, without hindrance or interference from any other cathedral officer. Let him use bâton or not as he may choose; let him place himself and his choir as he thinks best for the music: surely the most obdurate Conservatism ought not to deny this to one responsible for its due rendering. But what can be expected when the office of Precentor is so little understood or acknowledged that it can be assumed—as in a northern cathedral—by the utterly unmusical Dean, for the simple purpose of keeping control over the weekly scheme papers, and those papers made out by another hand, and apparently supplied in batches, undated, or we should not see Byrd in D minor set for Shrove Tuesday, followed by Aldrich in G major for Ash Wednesday, or have such unfortunate contretemps as "Blest are the departed" appearing in the city newspaper as set for the cattle-plague fast day.

But there is one point on which I must do battle with Mr. Dickson. I must stand up for the old English counter-tenor, which in these days it is so much the fashion to run down just because foreigners do not use it. I entirely deny that a second treble can be any more substitute for a counter-tenor than can a second tenor be substitute for a bass. Would Mr. Dickson be satisfied to give to his second boy the upper part of "Return blest days," "With sighs sweet rose," or any other of our fine old men's glees, or of Croft's "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," Battishill's "O remember not" (from "Call to remembrance"), or Weldon's "Bow down Thine ear" (from "Hear my prayer")? Surely he would be conscious of a certain unsatisfactory leanness of tone, a want of comfortable substance. Of course it is a matter of taste, but I must own to feeling this sense of unsatisfaction when boys take the second of the usual four parts. No doubt duet-trebles may be very delicious, as may be duet-sopranos; but the duet for sopranos is quite a different thing from that for soprano and contralto. The treble has no second register of its own, and English musicians have been in the habit of supplying this want by the upper of the three registers of man's voice. At one of the earlier Church Congresses Mr. Hullah startled clerical propriety by asserting that the grand want in our cathedral choirs was the contralto voice, and no one with an ear for the pure chord would be inclined to dispute the value of the addition if it could be had; and if, instead of sighing for his "enthusiasts with their violins, and celli, and contrabassi," Mr. Dickson would throw in his influence to get attached to our cathedral choirs auxiliary lady choirs, the waters might be moved in the right direction. If the cathedral had a supply of extra copies of all music in use, that the Precentor might lend to those who he found were willing and able to give regular service—with his unfettered control over rehearsals, the placing of his singers and himself, and his general conduct of the music, he might possibly find sufficient sopranos to add delicacy, refinement, and sympathy to the robustness of his treble tone, sufficient contraltos to give reality—I had almost said humanity—to his counter-tenor tone; and so we should be drawing nearer to that "perfection which should characterise all our acts of worship," which so many of us join with Mr. Dickson in desiring.

I am, yours very truly,

J. Powell Metcalfe.

AMATEUR COMPOSERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the last number of The Musical Times there are some remarks tending to discourage attempts at composition, on the ground that the gift for it was extremely rare. For the highest kind it is; but is nothing inferior to this to be accepted? A young lady refused to join an amateur literary society because she couldn't write so well as Shakespeare. In his "Violin School" Spohr advises the student to make repeated attempts to ascertain if he has a talent for composition. There has been a great advance in literary attainments. There are few Macaulays or Carlyles, but there are many who can express themselves well in prose and verse. Musical composition will no doubt in time be cultivated to a similar extent; attempts at it tend to improve a student in harmony, melody, rhythm, phrasing, and other branches of the art.

It would be ill-natured for a person not to publish when requested to do so by numerous friends. I have had some experience, having published pieces myself and revised those of others.—Yours obediently,

GEORGE SOTHERN.

14, Paulton Square, Chelsea.

[Spohr was perfectly right in advising students to ascertain if they have any talent for composition; but they should do so in private, not in public. It may be "ill-natured" for a tyro not to publish "when requested to do so by numerous friends," yet we cannot but think that were there one amongst his "numerous friends" who really wished him well, he would counsel him either to get a qualified opinion upon his works before submitting them for review or (to quote the words of the article to which our correspondent alludes) not to bring them "from their legitimate home amongst an exclusive little coterie of flatterers into the real world of art."—ED. MUSICAL TIMES.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERYSTWITH.—On the 10th ult. a meeting was held at the Assembly Rooms, St Michael's Place, to inaugurate a School of Music recently instituted by Professor Parry, Mus. Doc. After an eloquent address by Dr. Parry, and speeches from several influential persons advocating the desirability of establishing an institution in Aberystwyth especially for the cultivation of music, a vote of thanks was passed to the Mayor for presiding, and the meeting separated.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—The members of the newly-established Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Judas Maccabæus on Tuesday evening, September 30. The band and chorus numbered about 140. The choruses were given with great precision, and the solos were excellently rendered by Miss Smyth, Miss Kershaw, Mr. Ballam, and Mr. Rickard. Mr. Dearnaley officiated as Conductor.—— The first Concert (twenty-eighth season) of the Gentlemen's Glee Club was given on Wednesday, the 16th ult. The glees and songs were well rendered by the choir of the Club, under the conductorship of Mr. Dearnaley, who also performed two pianoforte solos. Miss Lucy Franklein was the solo vocalist.

BECKENHAM.—A most successful Concert was given in the Lecture Hall on Tuesday, the 21st ult., in aid of the Organ Fund of the new district Church of S. James's, Elmer's End. The sacred portion included three numbers from Spohr's God, Thou art great, Hear my prayer, "Lift thine eyes," and "I waited for the Lord" (Mendelssohn), the duet and solos being beautifully rendered by Mrs. Pascal, Mr. Charleton, Miss Burleigh, and Mrs. Radcliffe, and Gounod's "There is a green hill" and "Nazareth," by Mrs. Sicklemore and Mr. J. Evans, respectively. Part II. consisted of the March from Tannhäuser, "The cloud-capt towers," "Spinning Maidens," "Gipsy Chorus," and "Good Night" (Carulli), interspersed with solos, which included Cowen's "Regret," sung by Mrs. Sicklemore, who gave Molloy's "Kerry dance" as an encore; "Si tu savais" (Balfe), by Mr. Charleton, a local amateur; "Chloe sat beside a river" (Gabriel), beautifully sung by Mrs. Radcliffe, who obtaining an encore, gave "Within a mile of Edinbro' town"; and in the duet "Da quel di," from Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni, Mrs. Sicklemore and Mr. Charleton were eminently successful. The choruses and part-songs were sung by a select local choir, under the direction of Mr. Sydney R. Coles, F.C.O., and Mr. Arthur Carnall, Mus. Bac., and Mr. F. W. Partridge acted as accompanist, whilst Mr. E. Scovell effectively presided at the harmonium.

BIRMINGHAM.—A fine organ of forty stops, by Willis, has been erected in the Masonic Hall by Mr. Frank Bradley, for the purpose of giving Recitals, and also to afford organists generally an opportunity of public performance. The first Recital took place on Saturday, the 11th ult. Mr. Bradley performed a varied selection from the works of Wesley, Smart, Widor, and Lemmens, and arrangements from Wagner, Rossini, and Rubinstein. The vocalist was Miss Catherine Penna, who gave songs by Benedict and Bishop. The Recitals are to be continued every Saturday afternoon and evening. At present no other organist has availed himself of the opportunity of coming forward, but as the scheme gets better known it will doubtless be taken advantage of.——A fresh attempt to popularise the compositions of the great masters has been started by a series of Chamber Concerts at cheap prices, under the direction of Mr. S. S. Stratton. The first Concert took place in the Masonic Hall, New Street, on Tuesday, the 14th ult. The programme comprised Mozart's String Quartett in D, No. 10; the Trio for pianoforte and strings by F. E. Bache; and, for the first time in Birmingham, Miss Agnes Zimmermann's Sonata (Op. 21), for pianoforte and violin. The artists were Messrs. Abbott, Ward, S. Blythe, and Owen (strings), and Mrs. Hale (pianoforte). Besides the concerted pieces, the lady gave Chopin's Polonaise in C (Op. 3), Henselt's "La Gondola," and the Second Caprice (Op. 3) of Schumann. All the music was well rendered, and there was a large and appreciative audience. The local papers speak highly of the Concert, and there is every appearance of success for the new venture.—— Messrs. Harrison's first Subscription Popular Concert was given in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 22nd ult. The vocalists were Mesdames Albani and Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Signor Foli; Sir Julius Benedict was solo pianist, Mons. Musin solo violinist, Mr. Stimpson organist, and Mr. Zerbini conductor. A miscellaneous programme of more than average interest was provided. Madame Albani was recalled after the Recitative and Air, "Quando il giorno cade," from Flotow's Alma, and encored in Haydn's Canzonet, "My mother bids me bind my hair." Madame Trebelli sang Dr. Heap's song, "Lead, kindly Light," and the popular Habanera from Carmen; also with Madame Albani the Duet, "Quis est homo," all being beautifully rendered, and the second encored. The performance of Mr. Lloyd and Signor Foli were equally meritorious. Sir Julius Benedict, in his Andante and Rondo and transcription of "Where the bee sucks," showed that he was still master of his instrument; Mons. Musin delighted the audience with his skilful performances on the violin; Mr. Stimpson gave examples by Guilmant and Beethoven, and a new composition, "Fantasy, an Autumn Night's Dream," written expressly for the occasion; and Mr. Zerbini accompanied with his usual skill. There was a large and fashionable audience, indicating another prosperous season.——The Philharmonic Union gave its second Concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, the 23rd ult., with an excellent miscellaneous programme, comprising Beethoven's Quintett (Op. 16) for pianoforte and wind instruments; Weber's Sonata (Op. 48) for pianoforte and clarionet, Costa's Trio "Vanne e Colei," arranged for oboe, horn, and bassoon, the executants being Messrs. Dubrucq, Lazarus, Mann, and Wootton. Dr. Heap played in the quintett, and afterwards gave a fine rendering of Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53. Mr. Abbott played the Andante and Rondo from Max Bruch's Concerto, Op. 26, and with Dr. Heap, David and Benedict's grand Duo, "Oberon." The solo vocalists were Mrs. Bellamy and Miss E. Bailey, who gave works by Rubinstein and Spohr; the choral pieces included Schubert's 23rd Psalm, some numbers from Macfarren's May Day, new part-songs, "Evensong" (Dr. Heap), encored; "Summer is but fleeting" (Stratton), and Bishop's "Blow, gentle gales." The instrumental pieces were listened to with attention, and evidently much appreciated.

BRECON.—The Philharmonic Society gave its fourth Concert on the 18th ult., the first part of the programme being devoted to Handel's Acis and Galatea. The work was admirably performed and most attentively listened to by a highly appreciative audience. The solo singers were the Misses de Winton and Jones, and Messrs. Ramson, Tuckwell, and Fredricks. The Messrs. Heins accompanied most efficiently, and Mr. Mason, of Hereford, directed the work. The second part was miscellaneous.

BRIDLINGTON.—On Thursday evening, the 9th ult., Mr. George Fox, Organist of the Congregational Church, gave his Annual Benefit Concert in the Wellington Hall, assisted by Miss Grace Armytage, Miss Emmeline Kennedy, and Mr. Thomas Dodds (vocalists), Mdlle. Bertha Brousil (violinist), and Miss Isabel Wreghitt (pianist). There was a large audience, and the concert was highly successful. Mdlle. Bertha Brousil's violin solos were received with tremendous applause, and Miss Armytage and Miss Kennedy shared the honours of the evening. Miss Wreghitt ably accompanied throughout, and Mr. Fox conducted.

BRIGHTON.—On Wednesday, the 1st ult., a Harp Recital was given by Aptommas.——On the 8th, Mr. Kuhe gave his first Pianoforte Recital this season, on which occasion he had the assistance of Miss Emily Moore (vocalist) and Mr. Carrodus (violin).——On the day following, a large audience filled the Dome for Mr. Kuhe's first Subscription Concert, at which Madame Christine Nilsson appeared for the only time this season. The other artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Orridge, Mr. W. Shakespeare, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Kuhe (piano), and Mr. Carrodus (violin).——On the 16th, Miss Emily Moore gave her annual Ballad Concert, assisted by eminent artists.——On the 21st, the Dome was again crowded for Mr Watts's first Ballad Concert, which included selections from the Oratorios. The vocalists were Miss Robertson, Miss Butterworth, Madame Patey, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. George Fox, and Signor Foli The instrumentalists were Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé.——For the afternoon of the following day, Mr. Kuhe's second Pianoforte Recital was announced, and for the afternoon of Saturday, the 25th, his second Subscription Concert, at which Madame Albani, Mrs. Osgood, Miss De Fonblanque, Mr. B. McGuckin, and Signor Foli were engaged.—— The vocalists at the Saturday Afternoon Concerts during the past month at the Aquarium included Madame Sinico, Madame Edith Wynne, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas.——For the present month several important Concerts have been announced.

BRISTOL.—The second Monday Popular Concert for the present season was given in the Colston Hall on the 6th ult., when the band consisted of about fifty performers, under the leadership of Mr. A. W. Waite, Mr. George Riseley being the Conductor. The programme included the Overtures Rienzi (Wagner), Semiramide (Rossini), Der Freischütz (Weber), and Sterndale Bennett's Fantasia-Overture Paradise and the Peri. In addition Mr. E. Prout conducted an excellent performance of his grand Concerto in E minor for organ and orchestra, the organ part being ably rendered by Mr. Riseley. This clever work was extremely well received by the audience, the Andante, which forms the second movement, being particularly applauded. Mr. Prout also conducted the performance of a Suite in D major, which he had composed expressly for these concerts. The Suite contains five movements, viz., Prelude, Sarabande, Gavotte, Minuet, Trio, and Rondo. The vocalists were Miss Marion Henley and Mr. John Child.——On Monday the 20th ult. the third Concert was given in the Colston Hall, when the programme included the first of Beethoven's grand Symphonies (in C major), Mr. Riseley having promised that, commencing with this Concert, the whole of the immortal nine of this composer should be given in chronological order. The programme also included the overtures Oberon (Weber), and Merry Wives of Windsor (Nicolai), Gounod's Funeral March of a Marionette, and Massenet's tuneful Suite d'orchestre, No. 4, Scenes Pittoresque. Sir Herbert Oakeley also conducted a performance of his Festival March, dedicated to the Duke of Edinburgh, and his Minuet and Trio in A major, the March apparently pleasing most. The vocalists were Miss Layton and Mr. A. L. Wills. Mr. George Riseley conducted as before.

Castleford, Yorks.—On Tuesday, September 30, an interesting service was held in Whitwood Mere Parish Church, which had been specially decorated. The music was that of the York Diocesan Choral Association, and was faultlessly sung by the united choirs from Altofts, Whitwood, and Whitwood Mere, numbering eighty voices. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were the Unison Service in B flat, by Hopkins; the Anthem, "Sing, O Daughter of Zion," by Dr. Naylor, of Scarborough. Dr. Spark presided at the organ, built by Denman, of York, and played as Voluntaries an improvisation on the Sicilian Mariner's Hymn, followed after the sermon, by the Hon. and Rev P. Y. Savile, by a selection from Rossini's Stabat Mater, the duet from Judas Maccabæus, "O lovely peace with plenty crowned," and the Chorus from Samson, "Let their celestial concerts all unite"; at the end of which, "God save the Queen" was introduced with great effect.

Chorley.—Mr. A. G. Leigh gave his first Concert in the New Town Hall on Friday evening, the 10th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The vocalists engaged were Madame Patey and Mr. Edward Lloyd. Mr. Lloyd was, however, unable to appear, owing to a severe cold. Madame Patey's songs were enthusiastically received, as were also M. de Jong's solos on the flute. The performances of M. de Jong's band were admirable, and gave great satisfaction.

Colnbrook, near Windsor.—The first Concert of the season of the Colnbrook Choral Society was given on Wednesday, the 15th ult., in the Public Hall. The programme consisted of sacred music selected from the works of Mendelssohn and Mozart. Miss Seaborne presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Gywnn at the harmonium. The choruses were sustained with firmness, and the singers were rewarded with warm manifestations of appreciation. Miss A. Stransom contributed a pianoforte solo. Mr. Richard Ratcliff conducted.

Enniskillen, Ireland.—Mr. Arnold's Vocal Concert took place in the Town Hall on the 3rd ult. There was a crowded audience, including the Earl of Rosse, the Earl and Countess of Belmore, the Ladies Curry, Wm. Archdale, Esq., M.P., &c. The services of Miss Bessie Herbert (of Dublin) were secured, and her songs were highly appreciated. Major Sitwell, R.E., Mr. W. C. Trimble, Mr. W. Black, and Mr. James Plews also contributed songs with success. The chief interest, however, was centred in the Enniskillen Church Choir, the members of which sung with great taste. Mr. Arnold conducted.

Glasgow.—Mr. Frederic Archer (of the Alexandra Palace, London) made his first appearance here at the second of this season's Concerts given by his choir, on Saturday evening, the 11th ult., at the Kibble Palace. Mr Archer received a warm welcome from the large audience. The programme consisted of part-songs, solos, and piano solos, Mr. Archer's arrangement of some of the humorous songs being loudly applauded ——On the same evening Mr. Lambeth's choir gave a Concert at the St. Andrew's Hall. The large audience fully appreciated the admirable rendering of the programme. During the evening Mr. Lambeth played organ solos, and Mdlle. Lippmann gave solos on the pianoforte ——Harvest Thanksgiving services were held at St. John the Evangelist Episcopal Church, Cranstonhill, on the 19th ult. The choir gave an excellent rendering of the Te Deum and Communion Service from Service in B flat, by J. Baptiste Calkin, Op. 40. The anthems were, for the morning, "O give thanks" (G. Elvey), and for the evening "The Lord hath done" (H. Smart). The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were from the Service in F by E. J. Hopkins. Mr. John Lowe officiated as Organist and director of the choir. From the great number of strangers at the evening service, the fact is clearly proved that high-class church music is beginning to be appreciated by the various Scotch religious denominations, and it is now a common practice for the principal Presbyterian and other church choirs to sing anthems both at their morning and afternoon services.——The Glasgow Choral Union's published circular announces that during the forthcoming season the following works will be performed: Rossini's Moses in Egypt, Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, Schubert's Song of Miriam Beethoven's Ruins of Athens and Choral Symphony, Handel's Messiah.

Hamilton, Canada.—On Tuesday, the 7th ult., an Invitation Concert was given by Mrs J. R. Adamson (violinist) and Mr. Aldous (pianist). The programme included Bach's Concerto for two pianos and quartett; Andante and Variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata; Andante, Scherzoso, &c., from Beethoven's Quartett, Op. 60; Chopin's Polonaise in A flat; "In our boat," a song by A. C. Mackenzie, with violin obbligato; a Romanze for violin by Mr. Aldous; and the Tannhäuser March, arranged for eight hands on two pianos. The performance was excellent, and the programme shows an earnest endeavour on the part of the givers of the concert to familiarise the Canadian public with high-class music.

Ilkley, Yorkshire.—Dr. Armes, of Durham Cathedral, presided at the new Organ, erected by Messrs. Morten and Taylor, London, at the recent consecration of the church of St. Margaret. The organ, for its size, is very effective, the reeds being of excellent quality. The instrument was heard to great advantage under the skilful hands of Dr. Armes.

Kidderminster.—On Tuesday evening, the 7th ult., the Choral Society gave a selection from Haydn's Seasons, and Handel's Acis and Galatea, in the Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Glover Eaton, Mr. C. Blagborough, Mr. W. Deacon, Mr. A. Cotton, and Mr. J. Muston. The choruses and accompaniments were well rendered, and the performance throughout was a highly satisfactory one. Mr. W. Taylor presided at the organ, and Mr. Wadeley at the piano. Mr. Fitzgerald conducted.

Kirmington, North Lincolnshire. — A new Organ has been erected in St. Helen's Church, the necessary funds having been subscribed by the parishioners and friends interested in the place. The instrument has been built by Porritt, of Leicester, and comprises two manuals and pedal organ. On the opening day the prayers were intoned by the Rev. Arnold Savory, of Bradford, and the Rev. Walter Giffard, Vicar of Wootton. The preachers were the Rev. Canon Bullock, Rector of Welton-le-Wold, and the Rev. J. P. Young, the newly appointed Vicar of Great Grimsby. At the morning service, as the clergy entered the church, the choir sang with great effect the Processional Hymn, "Onward, Christian soldiers"; and in the afternoon, "Brightly gleams our banner." Sir George Elvey, Mus. Doc., Oxon., presided at the organ, and his powerful rendering of the musical part of the service was fully appreciated. He expressed his entire approval of the instrument, and of the manner in which Mr. Porritt had carried out the work.

Margate.—A superior Organ of considerable power and quality has just been erected in the new Wesleyan Chapel by Messrs. Morten and Taylor, London. The Organ has an excellent supply of wind, and is well constructed throughout. The voicing of the various registers displays much care and judgment. Mr. F. Archer, of the Alexandra Palace, was specially engaged for the opening Recital, and played with his accustomed ability.

New Wortley, near Leeds.—The fourth of a series of Concerts took place on Saturday night, the 18th ult., at the Public Hall, by the Orpheus Harmonic Union. The vocalists engaged for the occasion were Miss Phillips, Messrs. W. Fleetwood, Howard, Webster, Caselton, and Ryder. Mrs. G. H. Ryder and Miss Morsden presided at the pianoforte. The programme consisted of a selection of Sir H. Bishop's glees, with songs and duets by other eminent composers. The Concert on the whole was highly successful, and there was a very fair attendance.

Plymouth.—The members of the Vocal Association commenced their new season with an excellent performance of Haydn's Creation on the 8th ult., in the Guildhall. The solo vocalists were Miss Robertson, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Faull presided at the organ, Mr. Pardew led, and Mr. Löhr conducted. Mr. Thomas rendered good service with the flute, and Mr. Fly's trumpet obbligato was exceedingly effective.

Stalybridge.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Oratorio Joshua, at the Mechanics' Institute, on Thursday evening the 16th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss E. Arthur, Miss Patti Hargreaves, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Orlando Christian. The band and chorus numbered 120 performers. Mr. James Swallow was the leader, and Mr. Samuel Garlick conducted.

Sutton, Surrey.—The Harvest Festival was held on Wednesday the 8th ult., in All Saints', Benhilton, Parish Church At Evensong the choir was considerably increased, being assisted by the choirs of Banstead, Beddington, Epsom, Christ Church and Parish Church, Sutton. The service commenced with the processional "Come, ye thankful people," the prayers being intoned by the Rev. Canon Bridges. Tallis' Festival responses were sung, the plain-song being led by a melody-choir and united in by the people as intended by Tallis, the harmony-choir and organ filling up the whole with fine effect. The Psalms to Robinson, Dr. Dupuis, and Hopkins, from the "Westminster Chant Book," were well rendered; as was also the Magnificat, Dr. Stainer's St. Saviour's tone. The Nunc dimittis, by the Organist, Mr. Sharp, was sung most expressively by the choir The anthem was "O give thanks" by Farebrother, the solos in which were well rendered by Masters Petrie and Baldwin, and Messrs. Detmar and Burgon. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Stapylton, and the offertory was for the completion of a peal of bells. The recessional was Sullivan's "Onward, Christian soldiers." Mr. Sharp presided at the organ in a most able manner. On the following Sunday the anthem was Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land," solos by Messrs Detmar and Burgon, the latter especially displaying his fine sonorous voice. Te Deum and Benedictus (Dykes, in F), Kyrie (Sharp, in A flat). In the evening the same anthem by Farebrother, and the "Hallelujah" (Handel) were well sung at the close of the service. Great praise is due to Mr. Sharp for the manner in which the services were rendered, showing his excellent training of the choir.

Toronto.—A Concert in honour of the visit of the Marquis of Lorne (Governor-General) and the Princess Louise was given by the Philharmonic Society on September 11, in the pavilion of the Horticultural Gardens. On the arrival of the vice-regal party a Song of Welcome was sung, with orchestral accompaniment, the music of which, by Mr. F. H. Torrington, is extremely appropriate and effective. There was an excellent orchestra, assisted by the Beethoven Quintett Club and a portion of the Germania Orchestra of Buffalo.

Watlington.—On Wednesday, the 1st ult., a Concert, under distinguished patronage, was given in aid of the funds of the Watlington Cottage Hospital, by Mr. S. Cope, assisted by Miss Florence Wydford, Miss Rose Raymond, Miss Arnot, and Mr. G. Briars (vocalists), Miss E. Langford and Miss Ives (pianists), and Mr. Ives (violinist). The Watlington Orpheus Society contributed valuable aid. Mr. G. Darvill accompanied the solo music on the pianoforte, and Mr. S. Cope conducted. Miss Wydford was highly successful in the songs assigned to her, in the rendering of which she displayed much taste and feeling.

WEM.—Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his Annual Concert on Wednesday evening, the 1st ult. The vocalists were Mrs. Brandon, Messrs. A. and J. D. Pointon and T. Wood, of Hanley. An excellent programme was very well gone through, Mrs. Brandon receiving several encores. Mr. Prendergast was highly successful in his rendering of two of Beethoven's Sonatas.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in the Parish Church (St. John's) on St. Michael's Day. The choir, composed of the local Church Choir Association, numbered 115 voices; the service, which was fully choral, included Goss's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, and Barnby's Anthem "I will give thanks," the rendering of the latter being very fine. The Bishop of the diocese preached, and the offertory was devoted to the Church Improvement Fund. There was a crowded congregation, many persons being unable to gain admission. Mr. Arthur E. Crook presided at the organ.—Mr. Crook gave a Morning Concert at the Assembly Rooms on the 4th ult., assisted by the following artists: Mdlle José Sherrington, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Farley Sinkins and Mons. Albert, the violoncello-playing of the latter being greatly admired. Mr. Crook gave an excellent rendering of Beethoven's Sonata Pastorale. The concert was a great success.

WINCHESTER.—A most successful Concert was given at the Guildhall in aid of the building fund of Trinity College, London, on Tuesday, the 14th ult., by Mr. W. H. Pimlott, lay-vicar of the Cathedral and hon. local secretary of Trinity College; assisted by Miss Louisa Bullock, Miss Annie Ings, and a choir of thirty other students of Mr. Pimlott's vocal Lyceum, and also by Messrs. Griffith, Newby, Ings, and Cross, of the Cathedral choir. A feature of the Concert was the excellent pianoforte-playing of Miss Wooldridge and Mrs. W. P. Smith. The songs generally were well rendered, and the glees by the choir were given in a way reflecting great credit on the teaching of Mr. Pimlott. Mr. Gamblin accompanied the soloists with his usual ability.

WOMBOURN.—On Thursday, the 16th ult., the Harvest Festival was held in the Parish Church. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. R. M. Grier, M.A., Prebendary of Lichfield and Vicar of Rugeley, and in the evening by the Rev. T. M. Horsfall, M.A., Vicar of Bobbington. Both services were full choral, the prayers being intoned by the Rev. George A. Pugh, M.A. The Anthem, "I will alway give thanks," was given with very good effect by the church choir. Mr. Frederick A. Lister presided at the organ and played an excellent selection of pieces before and after the services. The church was, as usual, very artistically decorated.

WOOLWICH.—An excellent Concert was given at the Town Hall, on Monday evening, the 20th ult., under the direction of Mr. Whomes. The vocalists were Madame Bilhartz, Miss Whomes, Miss Christian, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. F. A. Bridge. Mr. Radcliffe contributed two flute solos, and a capital orchestra played some popular pieces. The hall was crowded.

YORK.—A Concert in aid of the funds of the Musical Society was given under its auspices in the Festival Concert Room, on the 8th ult. There was a large assemblage. The orchestra comprised a full band and chorus of 150 performers, Mr. R. S. Burton, of Leeds, being the conductor. The first part of the programme consisted of Athalie (Mendelssohn). The connective readings were given by the Rev. Canon Fleming, and the solo parts were well sung by Mrs. Godman, Miss Weaver and Miss Wakefield. The choruses were effectively rendered, and Mr. Burton was a most able Conductor. The second part of the Concert was devoted to miscellaneous music, chosen from the works of Mozart, Hérold, Francesco Rossi, Meyerbeer, Auber, and other composers.—A very successful performance of Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus was given in the large hall of the Yorkshire Fine Art Exhibition on Friday, the 17th ult. The artists engaged were Miss Maria Thompson, Mr. T. Baines, and Mr. A. McCall. Mr. W. R. Wright was an efficient Conductor, and great praise is due to him for his careful training of the band and choir.—A Ballad Concert was given in the Festival Concert Room on the 22nd ult., which was very successful. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Solo flute, Mr. Keppel; solo piano, Mr. Shute. The programme contained an excellent variety of songs and solos.

STEPHEN HELLER'S
PIANOFORTE STUDIES

A NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION,

COMPRISING THE SEVEN SETS—

Op. 16, Op. 45, Op. 46, Op. 47, Op. 90, Op. 125, Op. 138.

LINDSAY SLOPER.

In Twenty Books, each 6s.; or, in 3 volumes, each, net £1.

In bringing this important work before the notice of the musical public, ASHDOWN and PARRY beg to call particular attention to the following extract from Mr. Lindsay Sloper's Preface:—

"It is obvious that the purpose indicated in the preface to the original edition of these Studies—i.e., the cultivation of expression and rhythmical feeling—being paramount in M. Stephen Heller's mind, and the technical difficulty of each Study of secondary consideration, there might occur in one book studies which, while making no greater demand on the musical sentiment of the pupil than others, would present much greater mechanical obstacles to overcome. A progressive arrangement of these Studies, fusing the various books together, was considered desirable by M. Heller's publishers, and I have in the present publication attempted the task. The idea had previously occurred to a musician of repute in Vienna, Herr Hans Schmitt (to whom one of the numbers is specially and quaintly inscribed); but he did not venture beyond making a table of the various studies, in the order he would recommend them for practice. This plan was necessarily incomplete, since, to make a perfectly graduated study of them, it was necessary to be at once possessed of the entire work, consisting of twenty books. Now that they are published in the order I have considered desirable, a single Book may be purchased, with the security that each Study therein contained is of about equal mechanical difficulty with the rest; at the same time, the complete work is issued in volumes that the development of executive facility required may be viewed as a whole. To any objections that I have not always successfully classified the numbers in the strict ratio of their difficulty, I would submit that some of the apparently easy Studies require a considerable amount of musical feeling and intelligence. For instance, Nos. 14 and 15 are mechanically easier than No. 1, but surely demand from the player, the former more fancy, and the latter more emotional playing than can be expected from a juvenile student, who might correctly and appropriately render No. 1. An intimacy, extending over the whole of my professional life, with M. Heller's works, each year bringing with it stronger conviction of their individuality and proof of their constant freshness, and the personal relations with their author that I have during the same period been permitted to enjoy, are at least qualifications I may, without presumption, claim for the duty that has been confided to me."

From the Musical Standard, October 11.

"To praise the pleasant, genial, refined writings of Stephen Heller is to 'gild refined gold.' He has won his way in all quarters by the earnest purpose, the genial warmth, and the refined form of his compositions. These Studies are not, like Czerny's 'Fingerfertigkeit' or his 'Etude de Vélocité,' written to develope muscular power or mere rapidity of execution, nor are they, like the shoals of 'tutors' with which the market is flooded, silly selections of 'airs' which never instruct anybody how to do anything. Heller had a higher purpose; he wished to teach the student of the pianoforte to love music, and to be a musician first and a virtuoso afterwards. These Studies are not, as a rule, difficult to play, and their great superiority consists in the fact that while they develope technique, they develope also that soul of which technique is but the bodily frame. There are in all one hundred and seventy-seven Studies, and all are carefully and judiciously fingered. Messrs. Ashdown and Parry have given to the musical world a beautiful edition, ably edited and clearly printed, of some of the most refined and beautiful music to be found in the entire literature of the pianoforte."

J. BARNBY.

PREFACE.

"ACIS AND GALATEA" appears to have been composed for the Duke of Chandos about the year 1720, and was performed at Cannons in the year following.

As in many of Handel's works which were written about this period the disposition of the chorus parts is such as to warrant the supposition that the choir he had to deal with was limited in its numbers (there being apparently no Altos), and exceptional in the compass of its Tenor voices. This conjecture is borne out by the fact that the omission of an Alto part, and the division of the Tenor into two or three parts, is common to nearly all the works which Handel wrote for the Duke of Chandos, but is found in scarcely any, if any, of his subsequent compositions.

It would be difficult otherwise to account for so unusual an arrangement, although it might have been supposed that when his connection with the choir at Cannons ceased, he would have rearranged the vocal parts and brought them more into conformity with the requirements of ordinary choirs. But it would seem that when his attention became absorbed in the production of his Oratorios, he laid aside the smaller works of the "Chandos" period, only taking them up to transfer a movement which might be required for the larger composition then in hand. This, however, would not account for a work of the importance of "Acis and Galatea" being left in its exceptional state; for if the size and attractive nature of the Serenata did not claim more than ordinary consideration at the hands of its composer, its performance in London twelve years later—presumably with a chorus not possessing the peculiarities of the Chandos choir—would appear to have demanded some revision of its voice parts.

Nothing, however, seems to have been done in that direction—if we except a pencilled memorandum by the composer on the 1st Tenor line of "Wretched lovers," "This part in Contralt."—until about thirty years ago, when an equally rough and ready expedient was adopted by the Handel Society under the advice of Sterndale Bennett, viz.: to give the 1st Tenor line of nearly all the choruses to the Altos. It need scarcely be said, that as the range of the remaining Tenor parts coincided almost exactly with the one transferred to the Altos, the difficulties could only be regarded as mitigated, not removed.

It was plain—and it must have forced itself upon the attention of those who have directed its performance, as well as on those singers who have been condemned to wrestle with its well-nigh impossible Tenor parts—that a more radical and systematic rearrangement was required to place this work upon an equal footing with others of its class.

With this desire alone has the present edition been prepared and published.

In addition to the occasional transposition of voice parts in certain choruses, the Editor is responsible for much of the Pianoforte accompaniment, for suggested abbreviations in the Airs, and for the marks of expression throughout.

Edited by HENRY ALLON, D.D., and H. J. GAUNTLETT, Mus. Doc.

Providing Tunes, Chants, and Anthems, by the best Composers, Ancient and Modern. List of editions on application.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorals and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE.

"A. FETIS,

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist.

CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. WANTED—A COMPOSER FOR THE ORGAN.

By H. H. STATHAM.

THERE is no intention to imply, by the above heading, that there are not many contemporary writers for the grandest of instruments whose productions are well worth the serious study of the player and the serious attention of the listener. One of the most gifted among our native writers for the organ we have unhappily recently lost, one who never wrote carelessly or indifferently, and never forgot the high character of the instrument or descended to sensational or popular composition for its key-board. But it would not be difficult to name a good many living musicians, English, French, and German, who have supplied and will, it is to be hoped, continue to supply the organ-player with much food that is convenient for him and his hearers, in a considerable variety of styles or manners all calculated to bring out and illustrate qualities special to the organ as distinguished from other instruments. As to a different class of writers who turn out, currente calamo, showy and flimsy marches, offertoires, and other pieces calculated to produce much noisy effect with little real effort on the part of either composer or performer, and in which the true character of the instrument is entirely ignored for a style of handling which may be called prancing on it rather than playing on it, these need not be taken into account here at all. The organ is above all others the instrument for intellectual music, and productions into which no intellect goes are beside its mark altogether.

But admitting all the value and interest of a good deal that is written for the organ at present, it remains a fact, and a vexatious one for lovers of the instrument, that none of the few composers of the highest class, and who have the widest aims, seem disposed to pay any attention to the organ. There have been, in fact, only two classical composers for the instrument—Bach and (after a long interval) Mendelssohn. Handel may be named, perhaps, in virtue of his concertos, but he can only be named doubtfully. The organs on which he played, and for which he composed his few extant concertos, were so limited in their size and scope—wanting above all the great glory and power of the organ, the pedal-board—that it was impossible that he could realise or work out the special capabilities of the instrument. As rearranged for a large organ by the greatest of modern organ-players, two or three of these concertos can always be depended upon to "tell" with a general audience; and they are in this way very valuable to a player as furnishing music of a robust masculine type, such as no musician need be ashamed of caring for, and at the same time sufficiently simple and straightforward to appeal to the sympathies of a less cultured audience. It may be said that this praise, which may be applied in the same terms to a great deal of Handel's choral writing, is in reality almost the highest that could be given to a composer: and so it is in one sense. But while Handel's choral works not only represent the perfection of style in vocal writing, but rise at their best to the very loftiest musical feeling, his organ works never do rise to this point, and (which is more to the present purpose) they hardly ever represent the special powers of the instrument. With the exception of such short slow movements as that which opens the Fifth Concerto, there are hardly any movements among the organ concertos which may not be played with equal, sometimes with better, effect on the pianoforte; and, moreover, the "solos" introduced, and originally intended as display passages for the player, are mostly so hackneyed in form and resemble each other so much in manner, that a listener entering in the middle of one of these passages would find it difficult to say at the moment which out of two or three of the concertos was being played. What Handel may have made of these works when he played them himself, filling in the bare outlines and introducing, very likely, contrapuntal design extemporised at the moment, we can hardly judge; but, as they stand, these concertos can only in a modified sense claim to be regarded as classical organ music.

Of Bach it is unnecessary to say anything, of course: he is the acknowledged king of the organ. One observation may be made in regard to a point which amateur lovers of Bach, at least, hardly seem to recognise; that is, the decided way in which his organ preludes and fugues, as contrasted with those for the harpsichord or clavier, are put together in such a manner as to suit the special power of definition of the instrument. This is indeed obvious enough in the preludes, which are mostly of a style and design quite distinct from those written for the clavier. But a strict fugue is a strict fugue, for whatever instrument it be written; and accordingly some people have rashly supposed that the organ and harpsichord or clavier fugues of Bach may be interchanged from one instrument to another without loss of effect. But except in a very few instances this is an illusion. The organ fugues do not tell as duets on the piano, and the fugues from "The Forty-eight" do not as a rule tell on the organ: they are arranged so that the entry of the inner subjects can be brought out by means of finger pressure, while in the fugues for the organ, on which finger pressure has no effect in modifying tone, the subject is made to stand out by the mode of disposing the parts in extended harmony, which it would be impossible to play without the assistance of the pedal. The distinction is one difficult to define exactly or to illustrate by special passages, but it must make itself felt to all who endeavour to play the organ and the clavier fugues respectively in such a manner as to mark the entries of the subject clearly; and it is obvious that Bach, a great executant as well as a great player, felt instinctively the difference between the capabilities of the two instruments, and wrote accordingly, even in the strictest fugal composition.

After Bach, as before remarked, Mendelssohn is the one great name in organ composition. Mozart appears, judging from his recorded remarks, to have thoroughly understood the genius of the instrument, and to have extemporised on it in the pure organ style, to the equal delight of himself and of listeners who remembered Bach; but he wrote nothing specially for it. His two noble fantasias composed for a mechanical organ make splendid organ pieces as rearranged by Mr. Best, but they are not entirely in the organ style, and are in every respect exceptional among his works. Beethoven professed great enjoyment in playing the organ in his younger days, but wrote nothing for it. Schumann is the only other composer of great name who has touched organ-music, and his six fugues on the name of Bach are in the most serious and elevated style, and contain much to interest the player and hearer, but they impress one as laboured and only partially successful; and his little pieces called "Lieder ohne Worte for the Organ" have nothing organic about them, and might as well have been written for the piano. But Mendelssohn's organ works stand on quite different ground. They form the only modern examples of organ composition, by a composer of the first class, at once entirely suited to the instrument and representing the best capabilities of the composer. In this respect they have been very much underrated. Among the enthusiastic admirers whom Mendelssohn has had in this country, many (so separate an interest is organ-music in general society) hardly know anything of them; and by others we have heard them rated as among his weakest productions. To our thinking the very reverse is the case. Mendelssohn, who in a general way (as most people understand now) was a decided mannerist, and rather a sentimentalist among composers, is in his six organ sonatas less mannered and less sentimental than in most, if not any, of his other classes of work. They stand much higher as organ-music than his pianoforte-music does as pianoforte-music, and they are each completely distinct and individual in design and feeling, almost as much so as if they were the work of so many different hands: and of what other collection of compositions by Mendelssohn can this be said? The same may be said of his only other organ work, the three preludes and fugues. In the sonatas the fugues that are introduced are the weakest parts (except perhaps that in the Second Sonata, which has very fine points); fugue was not Mendelssohn's forte as a rule, and there is in his organ fugues occasionally a confusion as to the conduct of the part-writing, and even as to the method of writing it down, which is felt by the player perhaps more than by the listener. But, apart from this, these sonatas are noble examples of the application of new treatment to the organ—perfectly new at the time—which is entirely in accordance with the genius and the mechanism of the instrument. The step made in the First Sonata beyond all that had previously been written can hardly be overrated in its importance in regard to the modern development of the instrument; the recitative movement which precedes the finale opened quite a new set of resources in the expressive power of the organ, while the finale showed how effects previously regarded as special to the pianoforte could be translated into the language and adapted to the mechanism of the organ.* Each of the sonatas embodies some other suggestion for the treatment of the instrument, originated by the composer, in every case effective and successful, and most of which have since received the compliment of repeated imitation by composers of inferior calibre.

Now it is especially in regard to this suggestiveness and individuality of style in Mendelssohn's organ compositions that we are struck with the contrast when we consider the best of the organ-music which has been written since. Almost all the organ-music we have had since Mendelssohn (and, with his exception, since Bach) is that of composers who are specially organists, who play the instrument and write for it mainly. And players who write for their instrument almost always fall into a mannerism of style, and rarely achieve the highest that the art, or even the instrument, is capable of. If Beethoven, the greatest writer incomparably for the pianoforte, had confined himself to playing and composing for that instrument, there is every reason to suppose that, so far from his pianoforte works having been any finer or more perfect than they are, they would have been less so. The greatest compositions for any given instrument are produced by a composer of the highest calibre, whose genius demands many outlets, and can assimilate itself to the genius of each instrument he selects as the medium for expressing his ideas. It is only genius of the second or third order which is content to write merely for one instrument (Chopin being a rare, perhaps the only, exception). And the misfortune is that most of our modern organ-music is furnished simply by organ composers who never get to the heights of musical expression, and many of whom are hopelessly uninteresting. It would hardly be possible to find a more dead-level of mediocrity than in the voluminous pages of Rink's "Organ School," and the ponderous dulness of Hesse is only relieved by one or two pieces possessed of some brightness and character. We have had much better works produced by other writers for the organ since; but somehow the interest of their writing seems to concentrate in one or two successful and effective pieces which exhaust their capabilities. We get a sonata perhaps with the name of Van Eyken, or Ritter, or Merkel, which is so effective that we look out for other works by the same composer, only to find that they are echoes, as one may say, of the one successful work which has given the composer his name. Herr Merkel is a little more "all round" in this way than some others of his brethren, but it must be confessed that he draws upon Mendelssohn and Beethoven, unintentionally perhaps, but very obviously, to an extent which very much weakens his claim to originality. Herr Rheinberger's works present more variety and individuality than those of most of his contemporaries, and it is worth remark that he is one of the few modern organ composers whose works in other branches of composition have attained a recognised and deserved repute. This is the case too with our own late composer, Henry Smart; but even in his case the most friendly critic (and none could be more so than the present writer) must be conscious that there is a remarkable similarity in the style and even the phrases of a good many of his organ movements. Dr. Wesley, an organ-player of real genius, expended his strength, as far as the organ is concerned, mainly in extemporising, and his few published compositions serve rather to indicate what he might have done if he had given his mind more systematically to such composition, than to furnish any large or important addition to the organist's library. We are indebted to Mr. Silas for compositions few but admirable, and possessing more variety, colour, and piquancy of style than are found in the works of some organ composers more popularly known and reputed. Of the numbers of writers who have brought out "Three Andantes for the Organ" (and who has not?), all that can be said is that they have increased the stock of "in-voluntaries" (for "middle voluntaries" seem to have gone out), to be forgotten as soon as they have served that purpose.

But of the best and most respected of the contemporary writers, some of whom have been named above, it cannot surely be said that any one has contributed works to the organist's library which can be regarded as among the great classics of music. They themselves would be the very first to disclaim the idea. They have done what they could, and done it well, and we owe them the more thanks for their efforts to contribute to a branch of the art unaccountably neglected by the highest rank of composers. But what we want is to see the organ receive due attention at the hands of the foremost composers of the day. We have had a new violin concerto by Brahms, and a great excitement its production caused; but why cannot a composer of his calibre, so lofty in his style, so serious in his aims, turn some of his genius towards the organ, and give us a new sonata or set of sonatas which might form another epoch in the treatment of the instrument, and be as much

* This fine movement is sometimes criticised as unsuitable to the organ, simply on account of its being played faster than the composer intended. As an organ-player himself, Mendelssohn was quite alive to the capabilities and limitations of speech of the organ, and there is nothing in either this movement or the Allegro of the Fifth Sonata which is at variance with the quality of the organ, if the composer's metronomed time is adhered to.

a matter of general interest as a new violin concerto? Why can we not have something of the kind from Gounod, whose genius certainly has an affinity with the instrument, and who ought to be able to give us something which would take as high a position in organ music as his "Messe Solennelle" occupies in Catholic church music? It would be matter of great interest, too, to hear what Wagner would do with a work for a great modern organ; something new and unprecedented ought to come out of that, unquestionably. The contribution of important works for the organ by such composers would not only be a matter of the highest interest to the organ-player, but it would do something to bring the great instrument out of its comparative neglect by the modern musical world, and place it on a level in general estimation with the pianoforte. At present there are numbers of amateurs, well acquainted with other modern instruments and the music written for them, to whom organ-music is a terra incognita, and who have the most shadowy notions as to the instrument and its capabilities. And when the great composers entirely neglect it, we can hardly blame the general public for knowing no better.

By Joseph Bennett.

Dwelling a little while longer upon the Düsseldorf letters, we find in one of them, addressed by Mendelssohn to his sister Fanny, a remarkable opinion upon an abstruse question of art. Frau Hensel, it appears, had heard the violinist Lafont, and, addressing her brother, had spoken of the "revolution in violin-playing" since Paganini. Against this idea of revolution Felix protested with all his might, saying, "I don't admit that any such thing exists in art, but only in people themselves; and I think that very same style would have displeased you in Lafont if you had heard him before Paganini's appearance; so you must not, on the other hand, do less justice to his good qualities after hearing the other. I was lately shown a couple of new French musical papers, where they allude incessantly to a révolution du goût and a musical transition which has been taking place for some years past, in which I am supposed to play a fine part; this is the sort of thing I do detest." Mendelssohn's sisters—Rebecca joining in the argument—appear to have combated his notion of subjective as opposed to objective change, and hence the master quickly returned to the charge in a letter which deserves very careful consideration. He said, addressing Rebecca: "I . . . must absolutely resume the question of révolution; though this is chiefly meant for Fanny; but are you not identical? . . . And have I not pondered and brooded much over this theme since I got your letter, which now prompts me to write? You must, however, answer me in due form, till not one jot or tittle remains to be said about révolution. Observe, I think there is a vast distinction between reformation or reforming and revolution, &c. Reformation is that which I desire to see in all things, in life and in art, in politics and in street pavement; and Heaven knows in what else beside. Reformation is entirely negative against abuses, and only removes what obstructs the path; but a revolution, by means of which all that was formerly good (and really good) is no longer so, is to me, now as ever, the most intolerable of all things, and in fact only a fashion. Therefore I would not for a moment listen to Fanny when she said that Lafont's playing could inspire no further interest since the révolution effected by Paganini; for, if his playing ever had the power to interest me, it would still do so, even if in the meantime I had heard the angel Gabriel on the violin. It is just this, however, that those Frenchmen I alluded to can form no opinion of—that what is good, however old, remains always new, even though the present must differ from the past, because it emanates from other and dissimilar men. Inwardly they are only ordinary men like their predecessors, and have only outwardly learned that something new must come, so they strive to accomplish this, and if one of them is moderately applauded, or once in print, he instantly declares that this is a révolution du goût. This is why I behave so badly when they do me the honour (as you call it) to rank me among the leaders of this movement, when I well know that, for thorough self-cultivation, the whole of a man's life is required (and often does not suffice); and also because no Frenchman and no newspaper knows, or ever can know, what the future is to bring; and, in order to guide the movements of others, we must first be in motion ourselves, while such reflections cause us to look back on the past, not forward. Progress is made by work alone, and not by talking, which those people do not believe." This is a long quotation, but its importance is equal to its length, since it shows us very clearly what was Mendelssohn's opinion upon a question even more prominent now than in his day. The master believed that whatever is good in music at its creation remains good for ever: that its excellence is inherent and unchangeable, and cannot be affected by subsequent events. It may go out of fashion and be laid up in store as a curious exemplification of ancestral weakness, but this is a change in public taste, not in the thing itself. Hence, strictly speaking, there can be no revolution in art, but only in the minds of those who regard it. Mendelssohn held this so strongly that he could not alter—a fact set forth with singular vividness in his assertion that whatever he once thought good in old-fashioned Lafont he would continue to think good, though the angel Gabriel set a different style. We cannot all be Mendelssohns, but in proportion as right views obtain about art will the public mind approximate towards Mendelssohn's belief in this matter. At present music is to a large extent the sport of fashion. A man here or a man there starts up with a novelty, and the heedless crowd turn their backs upon their former idols to go and worship at the new shrine. Meanwhile, truly enlightened amateurs have the satisfaction of knowing that the good though unfashionable things remain as good as ever; and that, if revolutions must go on, the turn of that which is now despised will sooner or later come again.

At this time, and, no doubt, at all times since his last reference to the subject, Mendelssohn was anxiously desirous of writing an opera. But his strong perception of what a lyric drama should be, and absolute inability to discover a fitting poet, continued to stand in the way. Thus he wrote to Spohr in the letter from which a quotation has already been made regarding "St. Paul": "How gladly would I write an opera; but far and near I can find no libretto and no poet. Those who have the genius of poetry cannot bear music, or know nothing of the theatre; others are neither acquainted with poetry nor with mankind, only with the boards and lamps and side scenes and canvas. So I never succeed in finding the opera which I have so eagerly yet vainly striven to procure. Every day I regret this more, but I hope at last to meet with the man I wish for this purpose." By-and-by he thought to have found the much-desired man in Mr. Planché, who had written "Oberon" for Weber. But of this anon. The remainder of the Düsseldorf letters are taken up with grave subjects, such as the negotiations which ended by Mendelssohn's removal to Leipzig in 1835, and discussions with the people at home on questions of art. Here an opportunity occurs of throwing some light upon the character of Mendelssohn senior—a character which excited his son's most fervid intellectual admiration. Felix Mendelssohn, there is no doubt, had a singularly affectionate nature, but filial love alone cannot explain the almost worship with which he regarded his father, referring to whose death at the close of 1835 he said: "The wish which of all others recurred to my mind every night was that I might not survive this loss, because I so entirely clung to my father, or rather still cling to him, that I do not know how I can now pass my life, for not only have I to deplore the loss of a father (a sorrow which of all others from my childhood I always thought the most acute), but also that of my best and most perfect friend during the last few years, and my instructor in art and life." It is necessary, in order to know Mendelssohn, to get some idea of the man he thus idolised; and we cannot do better than make some extracts from a letter in which serious art-questions were discussed by the Berlin banker after a most suggestive manner. It is not surprising perhaps to find him calling in question the propriety of figured chorals, "where the figure, in a certain manner, carries out variations on the theme," because, as chorals are solely for congregational praise, the inexpediency of making them a framework for adornments might occur to anybody. But Abraham Mendelssohn shows more acuteness than most non-musicians possess when he says of Bach: "What first, through his 'Passion,' seemed quite clear to me, that Bach is the musical type of Protestantism, becomes either negatively or positively more apparent every time that I hear a new piece of his; and thus it was recently with a Mass that I heard in the Academy, and which I consider to be most decidedly anti-Catholic; consequently even all its great beauties seemed as unable to reconcile the inward contradiction as if I were to hear a Protestant clergyman performing Mass in a Protestant church." On another topic the writer was equally suggestive: "Your intention to restore Handel in his original form has led me to some reflections on the later instrumentation of his works. A question is not unfrequently raised as to whether Handel, if he wrote in our day, would make use of all the existing musical facilities in composing his oratorios—which, in fact, only means whether the wonted artistic form to which we give the name of Handel would assume the same shape now that it did a hundred years ago—to which the answer presents itself at once. The question, however, ought to be put in a different form—not whether Handel would compose his oratorios as he did a century since, but, rather, whether he would compose any oratorios at all. Hardly, if they could only be written in the style of the present day." The elder Mendelssohn then goes on to express a hope that his son's forthcoming oratorio ("St. Paul") would exemplify the union of ancient conceptions and modern appliances, adding: "These new resources seem to me, like everything else in the world, to have been developed just at the right time, in order to animate the inner impulses which are daily becoming more feeble. On the heights of religious feeling, where Bach, Handel, and their contemporaries stood, they required no numerous orchestras for their oratorios, and I can remember perfectly in my earliest years the 'Messiah,' 'Judas,' and 'Alexander's Feast' being given exactly as Handel wrote them, without even an organ, and yet to the delight and edification of every one." In the absence of this religious feeling, and "at a time when vacuity of thought and noise in music are gradually being developed in inverse relation," the writer demands an object for music "which by its fervour, its universal sufficiency and perspicuity, may supply the place of the pious emotions of former days." This object he assumes to have found in nature, "as a visible emanation from the Godhead, in her universality and her thousandfold individualities." Recognising this in certain works of Haydn, Mendelssohn's "guide, philosopher, and friend," as well as father, adds, "I individually could as little endure to lose in the 'Creation' and in the 'Seasons' the crowing of the cock, the singing of the lark, the lowing of the cattle, and the rustic glee of the peasants, as I could in nature herself; in other words the 'Creation' and the 'Seasons' are founded on nature and the visible service of God—and are no new materials for music to be discovered there?" These extracts are sufficient as an index to the sort of man whom our master held in profound reverence as well as regarded with filial love, and they explain how it was that the great musician could write to the banker and say: "I often cannot understand your having so acute a judgment with regard to music, without being yourself technically musical; and if I could express what I assuredly feel with as much clearness and intuitive perception as you do as soon as you enter on the subject, I never would make another obscure speech all my life long." But this is only one proof among many that the critical and executive faculties have no essential connection. Shallow people often sneer at musical critics who are not musicians, and it must be conceded that as critics often go, if they have no technical knowledge, they have nothing; nevertheless, a man may discharge the highest functions of the critical office without being able to read a score, while, per contra, another may have the complete science at his fingers' ends and not the smallest power of judgment in his head.

Pass we now to a lighter theme. The reader possibly remembers some expressions in one of our master's Paris letters with reference to the publication of his portrait. He then declared a resolution not to do that which now is the first thing a would-be artist achieves, until he had become a great man. To that vow we find Mendelssohn rigidly adherent. A gentleman resident in Cologne wrote, suggesting that his likeness should be taken; and the master replied in such terms that, if Herr Hixte did not know his correspondent well, he must have been somewhat astonished: "The idea which you communicate is very flattering to me, and yet I confess I feel a certain dislike to do what you propose. For a long time past I have entertained this feeling. It is now so very much the fashion for obscure or commonplace people to have their likeness given to the public in order to become more known, and for young beginners to do so at first starting in life, that I have always had a dread of doing so too soon. I do not wish that my likeness should be taken until I have accomplished something to render me more worthy, according to my idea of such an honour. This not being the case yet, I beg to defer the compliment till I am more deserving of it, but receive my thanks for the friendly good nature with which you made me the offer." If worthy Herr Hixte passed this letter on to his friends there must have been general wonder in Cologne as to what manner of man the writer was. In our portrait-ridden day, when everybody who has just managed to creep into publicity is exhibited in shop-windows or lithographed in "society journals," Mendelssohn would perhaps be deemed a fit subject for a writ of inquiry in lunacy.

It is clear that the composer was very glad to remove to the Saxon capital. He settled in the Rhenish town mainly for leisure, and, having obtained what he wanted, began, after his usual manner, to exaggerate the discomforts from which he sought to flee. Considering that Mendelssohn had been two years in Düsseldorf, we must not receive very literally his humorous description of the orchestra to Hiller: "I assure you that, at the beat, they all come in separately, not one with any decision, and in the pianos the flute is always too high, and not a single Düsseldorfer can play a triplet clearly, but all play a quaver and two semiquavers instead, and every Allegro leaves off twice as fast as it began, and the oboe plays E natural in C minor, and they carry their fiddles under their coats when it rains, and when it is fine they don't cover them at all—and if you once heard me conduct this orchestra, not even four horses could bring you there a second time." But eager as Mendelssohn was to get away to Leipzig and a better band, his scrupulous sense of honour hindered the negotiations to that end for some little time. In answering the letter of invitation, he first stated his readiness to comply, and then continued: "I should not like, however, by such acceptance to injure any one, and I do not wish, by assuming this office, to supplant my predecessor. In the first place, I consider this to be wrong, and, moreover, great harm ensues to music from such contentions. Before, then, giving a decided answer to your proposal I must beg you to solve some doubts . . . should I by my acceptance injure any other musician? I hope you will answer this last question with perfect candour, imagining yourself in my place; for, as I previously said, I have no wish to deprive any one either directly or indirectly of his situation." On the point here stated Mendelssohn was firm, and Devrient tells us that only when a satisfactory arrangement had been made with his predecessor, Polenz, would he accept the post.

Prominent among the earlier letters from Leipzig is one to Ferdinand Hiller wherein Mendelssohn plays the thankless and often risky part of a candid friend. Hiller's overture in D minor had been played under Mendelssohn's direction at a Gewandhaus concert with, apparently, little success, and the conductor thereupon wrote to the composer in terms as profitable as they were plain, and as generous as they were severe. After observing that the audience heard the themes of the overture with pleasure, but lost interest in their development, Mendelssohn went on: "This seems to me important, for I think it is connected with the point which we have repeatedly discussed together, and the want of interest with which you seem occasionally to regard your art having at length become perceptible to others. I would not say this to you were it not that I am perfectly convinced the point is one which must be left to each individual, as neither nature nor talents even of the highest order can remedy it; a man's own will can alone do so. Nothing is more repugnant to me than casting blame on the nature or genius of any one; it only renders him irritable and bewildered and does no good. . . . Providence is answerable for this defect in his nature. But if it be the case, as it is with this work of yours, that precisely those very themes, and all that requires talent or genius (call it as you will), are excellent and beautiful and touching, but their development not so good—then, I think, silence should not be observed; then, I think, blame can never be unwise, for this is the point where the composer can improve himself and his works; and as I believe that a man with fine capabilities has the absolute duty imposed on him of becoming something really superior, so I think that blame must be attributed to him, if he does not develop himself according to the means with which he is endowed. And I maintain that it is the same with a musical composition. Do not tell me it is so, and therefore must remain so; I know well that no musician can alter the thoughts and talents which Heaven has bestowed on him, but I also know that when Providence grants him superior gifts, he must develop them properly. . . . I believe that your talents are inferior to those of no musician, but I scarcely know one piece of yours that is systematically carried out. The two overtures are certainly your best pieces, but the more distinctly you express your thoughts, the more perceptible are the defects, and in my opinion you must rectify them. . . . How many musicians are there who would permit another to address them thus! And though you must see in every expression of mine how much I love and revere your genius, still I tell you that you are not absolute perfection, and this musicians usually take very much amiss. But you will not. You know my sincere interest in you too well." This is a noble letter, throwing a flood of light upon the character of our master as a faithful friend and a devoted servant of art. Ferdinand Hiller makes no reference to it in his book on Mendelssohn, but we can easily believe that the strong expressions of his brother composer wounded him—as indeed they were meant to do. Faithful, nevertheless, are the wounds of a friend, and he best deserves so great a gift who accepts and profits by the lessons of their smarting.

At the time when Mendelssohn wrote the letter just quoted, his spirit was weighed down by grief at the loss of his father, and this may account in some measure for the gravity, not to say the solemnity, which marks his correspondence during the early months at Leipzig. All the same, however, his native vivacity occasionally asserts itself in slashing criticism and humorous remark. Anent Handel's Coronation Anthem (presumably "Zadok the Priest") he said to Fanny Hensel: "It is most singular. The beginning is one of the finest which not only Handel, but any man, ever composed; and all the remainder after the first short movement, horridly dry and commonplace. The performers could not master it, but had certainly been far too busy to distress themselves about that." From the Anthem, which Mendelssohn possibly had not then heard sung by the Charity children in St. Paul's, he passed to certain imaginative critics and commentators who in his day, as now, were discovering in music wondrous ideas that never occurred to the composer: "Many persons here consider 'Melusina' to be my best overture; at all events, it is the most deeply felt; but, as to the fabulous nonsense of the musical papers, about red coral and green sea-monsters, and magic palaces, and deep seas, this is stupid stuff, and fills me with amazement." Amazement, by the way, was always Mendelssohn's attitude towards such realistic application of musical ideas. The truly great composer lives and moves in a region of feeling, and cannot understand the necessity which compels people who are not actually musical to create a code of interpretation out of the phenomena of the material world. From that necessity springs "programme music," which is thus a product of artistic incapacity, and, by its birth-taint, debarred from rising above a low standard of artistic worth. Mendelssohn had rarely much to say about his critics, but, as we have seen, there were occasions when he showed a little natural soreness. His "stupid stuff," anent the red coral and so on, was a half-jocular observation; but in a letter to Dr. Rosen, of London, who had written a work on the "Vedas," he shows real irritation: "When I feel how little I, who don't understand it, and who never learnt it, can do justice to the vast circumference of such a work, I may indeed congratulate you the more that no spurious connoisseurs or dilettanti can grope their way into your most favourite thoughts, while you must feel the more secure and tranquil in your vocation, because arrogant ignorance cannot presume to attack you behind your bulwarks of quaint letters and hieroglyphics. They must be able to decipher them tolerably before they can attempt to criticise, so you are better off in this respect than we are, against whom they always appeal to their own paltry feelings." A deep-seated grievance lies under these words—one which Mendelssohn was too politic or too disdainful to show the world at large. But there was nothing in his character, now fully developed, to show that it arose from wounded vanity. Mendelssohn had notions about the dignity and claims of his art such as very few of his critics entertained, and consequently there was on their part a non-comprehension of him; on his side a natural contempt for them. To what a point he carried his ideas of art-service appears in a letter to his mother, who had asked him to persuade Frau Hensel to publish some of her music: "To persuade her to publish anything I cannot, because it is contrary to my views and convictions. . . . I consider the publication of a work a serious matter (at least it ought to be so), and I maintain that no one should publish unless he is resolved to appear as an author for the rest of his life. For this purpose, however, a succession of works is indispensable, one after another." It may be wished that all composers (so-called) in our day had Mendelssohn's fastidiousness on this point. In the same spirit he wrote to his brother Paul of the hollowness of popular success: "It is singular that in my position . . . the more I find what are termed encouragement and recognition in my vocation the more restless and unsettled does it become in my hands, and I cannot deny that I often long for that rest of which you complain. So few traces remain of performances and musical festivals, and all that is personal; the people indeed shout and applaud, but that quickly passes away without leaving a vestige behind, and yet it absorbs as much of one's life and strength as better things, perhaps more." It must be confessed that these words and others which might be quoted are somewhat at variance with the common idea of Mendelssohn as a seeker after popularity—a butterfly of art searching for and basking in the brightest rays of the sun of public favour.

By Fr. Niecks.

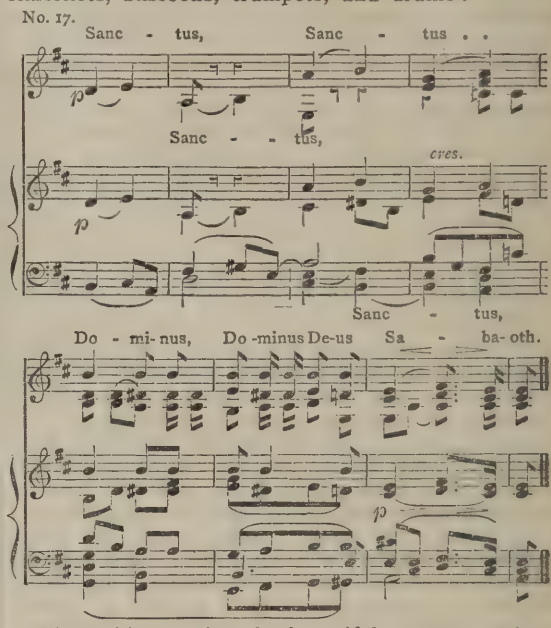
The words "mit Andacht" (with devotion), which are prefixed to the "Sanctus" (Adagio, 2-4, B minor, 33 bars), indicate the general character of this movement. But what verbal language, however copious and cunningly devised, could define the devotional mood pictured and excited in us by these melodic lines and harmonic combinations with their warm, subdued tone-colouring! The first eight bars are assigned to the double-basses, cellos, divided violas, clarionets, bassoons, and three horns. At the ninth bar the three trombones enter with solemn chords, closely followed by the trumpets and drums, which add a few short and humble notes. With the twelfth bar the voices begin to come in one after another, and softly (No. 17), remaining throughout the movement, as also the instruments do, in the lower registers: the violins, flutes, and oboes are not employed at all. We are in an attitude of adoration, afraid to move or even to breathe for fear of disturbing the solemn reverential silence, the inward and outward calm. In the rapt beatific contemplation of God's holiness, the Lord of Hosts is lost sight of ("Sanctus Dominus Deus Sabaoth"). And how expressive and impressive are those intervening chords of the trombones with the accompanying clarionets, bassoons, trumpets, and drums!

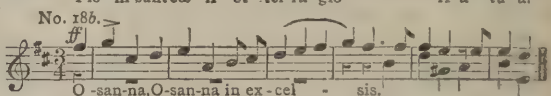
No. 17.



When this wondrously beautiful movement has died away with the whisperings of the voices and the vibrations and long-drawn chords of the instruments, the trebles and orchestra strike up the bright, joyful "Pleni sunt cœli et terra gloria tua, Osanna in excelsis" (Allegro pesante, C, D major, 19 bars), as brilliant in colour as it is full of swing in outline—the first flute soaring in the highest regions of its compass, the strings running alongside the voices, which in imitative succession step and leap forth with an exuberance of delight (No. 18*a*). After this the "Osanna in excelsis" is separately treated (Presto, 3-4, D major, 26 bars); here the strings, and in one place also the bassoons, again periphrase the jubilant vocal strain of the fugato, whilst the winds reinforce the voices or help to fill up the concent (No. 18*b*).

No. 18*a*.

No. 18*b*.



The settings of the "Pleni sunt cœli," and the "Osanna" are certainly superlatively appropriate; but however vigorous, full of life and exaltation, they appear to me too fragmentary. Yet the words are eminently suitable for musical treatment, and liturgical exigencies did not fetter the composer. Bach in the B minor Mass gives 148 bars to the "Osanna in excelsis," and to the words of the "Sanctus" preceding the "Osanna" 168 bars. Cherubini in the D minor Mass gives less than 10 bars to the words "Sanctus Dominus, Deus Sabaoth," about 15 bars to the "Pleni sunt cœli et terra gloria tua," and 41 bars to the "Osanna in excelsis"; whilst Beethoven, as we have seen, gives to them respectively 33, 19, and 26 bars. In the "Benedictus," "Agnus Dei," and "Dona," on the other hand, Beethoven exceeds in length both Bach and Cherubini. May we not, from the extent of the comments on the different parts of the text, guess at the degree of attraction which they had for the composers, and thence at their mental and religious constitution? It would be rash to jump at a conclusion with no better footing than this, but taken in connection with other facts this one is not without significance. The "Osanna" leads directly into the "Præludium," which prepares our hearts and minds for what follows. This prelude is a necessary link; without it the transition from the jubilee of the "Osanna" to the mystic rapture of the "Benedictus" would have been too abrupt. The prelude consists of 31 bars of an organ-like character (Sostenuto ma non troppo, G major), and is assigned to the double-basses, cellos, divided violas, flutes, bassoons, joined by the clarionets in the eighth bar from the end, and by the double-bassoon and organ (Ped. sub-bass) in the seventh bar from the end. Here the question suggests itself, Why did Beethoven not assign this movement to the organ? indeed, why did he not give more prominence to this instrument? The reason is obvious: Beethoven preferred living individualities to a dead mechanism, and felt that the distinctive characters of the orchestral instruments are not equalled by the stops of the organ. With regard to the "Præludium" we must keep in mind that between the "Sanctus" and "Benedictus," whilst the priest and congregation pray in silence, the transubstantiation takes place, or is supposed to take place, and the sacrament is elevated. It is this solemn moment which the "Præludium" is intended to accompany. What a contrast if we compare this movement of Beethoven's with the operatic airs played on the organ that serve the same purpose in Italian churches! At the last bar the solo violin and flutes in the upper register commence and lead in the "Benedictus" (Andante molto cantabile e non troppo mosso, 12-8, G major, 123 bars). It is one of the loveliest, sweetest visions ever seen and revealed by poet, prophet, or saint, a real Jacob's ladder down which descend heavenly messengers that instil into our hearts peace, comfort, and goodwill. The long-sustained notes of the horns open an infinity around us, and rapt in restful silence we feel rather than utter the words "Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini."

No. 19.
Violino Solo.

I know of no work in which the violin produces such an ethereal, quite unearthly effect. It surrounds us mysteriously, like a divine presence. Indeed, everything contributes to complete this picture of perfect bliss—the lovely movements of the melodic lines, the gentle rhythms, the bewitching colouring, &c. Nothing harsh falls upon our ears, for the fine forte passage "In nomine Domini," where the trombones strike in, is full and rounded. Besides this passage I will specially mention that where the solo violin has the twice-accented D sharp, the third of the harmony (three bars before the C major), and all the other instruments employed sustain far below the fundamental and fifth—harmonic progression and colouring are alike noteworthy. But here I am reminded of Schindler's remark in one of his last conversations with the great master: "Words can do nothing here; they are bad servants of the divine word which music utters." And what is it that music utters here? It seems to me that this "Benedictus" justifies Beethoven's pretension for his art—that music is a higher revelation than wisdom and philosophy.

The "Agnus Dei" repeats some of the words of the "Gloria," "Qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis;" after which the "Dona nobis pacem" concludes the Mass. Now what has Beethoven done with these words? As to the first section of this portion of the text, he set it to an Adagio (B minor, C, 95 bars). The thought, which in the "Gloria" is soon superseded by another, is in the "Agnus Dei" dwelt upon, and the longer dwelt upon the more deeply felt will be the necessity of the prayer, the "Have mercy upon us," to "Him who takes away the sins of the world." A more touching conception than Beethoven's is impossible. The colouring, in accordance with the downcast spirit and contrite heart that speak out of this movement, is very sombre, especially at the beginning. The bassoons determine the tint; along with them are engaged four horns and strings; farther on other instruments join. The ascending and descending of the melody express well the urging and the anguish of the supplicants (No. 20). The expression becomes more and more intense, the hidden emotions which the solo voices and chorus cannot utter are revealed by the orchestra. Mark the quaver passages of the strings, the supplicatory motive of the wood winds, &c. Also the manner in which the solo voices and chorus (first only four-part men's chorus) alternate and combined set forth the urgency of the prayer.

With regard to the "Agnus Dei," criticism must either confine itself to pointing out beauties or be silent; not so, however, with regard to the "Dona nobis," where, I think, Beethoven shows that, after all, he is but a fallible man. At any rate, he does not rise to a height equal to that of the other parts of the Mass. Perhaps the "Dona" is the weakest part because Beethoven aimed at too much, and at what are irreconcilables. He superscribes it "Bitte um innern und äussern Frieden" (Prayer for inward and outward peace). Nothing easier than to bring the two things into one sentence; the antithesis "inward—outward" has even a telling effect; but to embrace the two, to unify them in one conception, is more than mortal man can do. Moreover, in introducing this prayer for outward peace Beethoven steps down to a lower platform. We have been praying heretofore only for things spiritual—have been meditating on, and been brought face to face with, the highest mysteries of religion; and now at last we turn away from these sublimities to the wretched concerns of our terrestrial existence. The thought of war, with its trumpet-calls and turmoil, is a false note in the divine harmony of the great master's work. This shortcoming, however, must not blind us to the great beauties of the "Dona."

The "Sanctus" and "Dona" are closely joined together. The latter begins with an Allegretto vivace (D major, 6-8, 68 bars), and is distinguished by a lovely flowing melodiousness in all the parts, instrumental as well as vocal. The orchestration is elaborated with the greatest delicacy. The airy lightness and gracefulness of some of the figurations would draw upon them the reproach of worldliness, did their immaculate purity not protect them. Still it cannot be denied that this "Dona" is the least sacred part of Beethoven's Mass: the doors of the church are, as it were, already thrown open, and the pleasures and sorrows of the world without are seen from within. Were it not for the supplicatory passages the contents might be characterised as idyllic. But the serenity of the prayer for peace is suddenly interrupted—an unexpected F startles us in A major (Allegro assai, C, B flat major, 16 bars). The drums roll pianissimo, the strings wail, the trumpets sound from afar, whereupon the alto solo exclaims anxiously (Recit. tramidamento—ängstlich) "Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi," accompanied by the strings with chords rhythmically divided into semiquavers, whilst the drums and trumpets are heard again, this time louder; the alto solo is followed by the tenor solo with "Agnus Dei miserere, miserere nobis;" fear increases with the approach of the danger, the chorus cries "Miserere nobis," the trumpets and drums are now heard fortissimo, and the soprano solo shrieks out "Agnus Dei dona." With the last word the tempo primo and the matter it contained returns, although in another key, and in part differently worked out (F major, 76 bars). Next comes what we may call a martial symphony (Presto, C, D major, 60 bars).

ff Double Basses, Celli, and Double Bassoon.

It pictures to us the proud, defiant, insolent bearing of a soldiery advancing, sure of victory, against their enemy, the following B flat major (28 bars), with its heavy chords and trumpet-calls, &c., the attack—twice the chorus supported by the full force of the orchestra and organ invokes the "Agnus Dei," and afterwards prays "Dona pacem," the soprano solo repeating the words a bar later at the top of her voice. With this the turmoil and horrors of war pass away, once more the tempo primo (78 bars) returns, before long also the tonality of D major, and thus the "Missa Solemnis" is brought to a conclusion. The introduction of the admirable but somewhat theatrical martial episodes, which, as I have already remarked, disturb the ideality and unity of the work, is particularly detrimental to the peaceful calm which characterises the "Dona" and qualifies it pre-eminently to form the close, to be, as it were, the resolution into perfect trustfulness in God of the previously experienced emotions of fear and hope, contrition and exultation.

Beethoven's orchestration is not only above criticism but even above praise. I shall therefore add nothing to what I have already said in the course of the analysis about this matter, except a word of warning to the reader, namely, not to judge the "Missa Solemnis" by the pianoforte score, which can give him no idea, or at least but a very imperfect one, of the beauty and significance of the work, more especially of the "Dona." Beethoven's vocal writing, on the other hand, has often enough been protested against and reprehended. The master reminds one of a general who disregards the comforts and even sacrifices the lives of individuals in order to attain his object. Beethoven's ideas do not conform to the voices, but the voices must conform to the ideas. Nothing can move him to change a note, however urgent the entreaties of the singers, and however well-founded their complaints may be. To be sure the demands he makes on the voices are excessive, and some of the uses he puts them to out of keeping with their character (for instance the syncopations of the florid solo passages in the Coda of the "Credo" fugue), but after all we must confess that when these difficulties are overcome the total effect is grand. Beethoven rarely rises in his vocal compositions as high as in his instrumental ones. The narrowness and formality of the word fettered his imagination; he must have room to expand, to soar. Give him a congenial subject, suitably treated, and he is as great in vocal as in instrumental music. Whatever is mean, little, and commonplace is distasteful to him; only the noble, grand, and sublime attract him. These last are the qualities which are most prominent in his thoughts, actions, and opinions.

Beethoven's religious views have a special interest for the student of his sacred compositions. Although religion was one of the topics the master would not discuss—he said it was a matter which every one must settle for himself—we find enough in his diaries and elsewhere to form some idea of what these views were. A favourite book of Beethoven's was Sturm's "Contemplations on the Works of God in the Domain of Nature and of Providence," and the extracts from it, and the marks and annotations in it, more especially the poems noted by the composer to be set to music, deserve attention (see "Beethoven's Brevier" by L. No). They show us that in religion, as elsewhere, it is the sublime he loves to contemplate, the omnipotence, the omnipresence, and omniscience of God. A passage very much to his liking was this one: "King of heaven, Lord of the stars, Father of spirits and men! Oh, that I could rise to those innumerable stars, where Thou hast more than on this sphere revealed Thy greatness!" &c. The starred heavens have a great attraction for Beethoven. He himself told Czerny that he composed the Adagio of the Quartett, Op. 59, ii., when one night he contemplated for a long time the starry heavens, and thought of the harmonies of the spheres.

And in one of his conversation-books of the year 1820, he writes, "The moral law within us and the starry heavens above us." But perhaps of the greatest interest and significance are those inscriptions from the temple of the goddess Neith at Sais, which, copied by Beethoven, stood for many years framed on his writing-table: "I am what is." "I am all that is, was, and will be. No mortal man has raised my veil." "He is solely of Himself, and to this One Being all things owe their existence." To these inscriptions may be added a quotation from Indian literature in his diary of 1816: "God is immaterial, therefore He is beyond all conception; as He is invisible He can have no form. But from what we perceive in His works we may conclude that He is eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent." Beethoven's diaries are full of appeals to the Deity, some of them have already been quoted in an earlier part of this paper (p. 194). His relation to God and men is well illustrated by that curious autobiographical document, the so-called testament of Beethoven, written in 1802 when he was ill and thought death was approaching. I shall insert here a few extracts: "Oh, ye men who think and declare me malevolent, peevish, or misanthropical, how you wrong me! You do not know the secret cause of what seems thus to you. My heart and mind were from childhood disposed to the tender feelings of benevolence. I was even always disposed to perform great actions. But only consider that for the last six years I have suffered from a dreadful disease, aggravated by injudicious physicians; year after year I have been deceived in my hopes of recovery, and am finally forced to regard my malady as a protracted one, the cure of which may require years, or even be impossible. Born with an ardent vivacious temperament, even susceptible to the diversions of society, I was in my early days obliged to isolate myself, to pass my life in solitude." After some touching remarks on his deafness and its consequences, he continues: "God, Thou seest my heart, Thou knowest that love of mankind and a disposition to do good dwell therein. Oh, men, when you some day read this, think that you have wronged me, and let those who are unhappy comfort themselves with finding one like themselves who, in spite of all the obstacles of nature, has done all in his power to be received among the number of worthy artists and men. . . . You, my brothers Charles and ——, as soon as I am dead ask Professor Schmidt, if he be then alive, to describe my disease, and annex this document which I am now writing to the account of my illness, so that as far as possible the world may be reconciled to me after my death. Recommend to your children virtue; it alone can make happy, not money. I speak from experience. It was virtue which lifted me up even in misery; without it and my art I should have put an end to my life by suicide." Through this document we get some insight into Beethoven's character; we are made acquainted with the circumstances that moulded it. Without the hardships of his youth, without the severe trials of his advanced life, he would never have attained that depth, sublimity, and religious enthusiasm which the "Missa Solemnis" so strongly manifests. Beethoven's standard of truth, duty, and humanity was so high that it was constantly clashing with the actuality of things. Hence his ebullitions of wrath, in which, being ignorant of the ways of the world and judging too hastily by appearances, he was often gruff and unjust. Indeed, he lived in the world, but was not of the world. As Carlyle said of Schiller and Goethe, so we may say of Beethoven, and with greater pertinence, his social life was only as the dwelling-place and outward tabernacle of his spiritual life. And now I shall conclude my remarks on this unique work of genius and its creator with a prose translation of the words extracted by himself from Zacharias Werner's "Sons of the Valley," of which the master no doubt felt the truth and the applicability to his own case: "The iron finger of destiny breaks only the weakling's strings; the hero boldly presents the harp which the Creator has placed in his bosom to fate. However it rages in the strings, it cannot disturb the inner magnificent accord, and the dissonances soon blend in pure harmony, because the peace of God breathes through the strings."

SOME POPULAR FEASTS AND THEIR MUSIC.

CHRISTMAS is again near at hand, and the old but ever new story of Christmas festivity "when life was worth living" will, no doubt, again be told to eager ears. This is one of the subjects that, like love, can never be exhausted; about which, moreover, all persons feel in common. The aged, who as by a natural process have become laudatores temporis acti, dwell upon the Christmas festivities of their youth with a fond delight, enhanced by contrast of the enjoyment they conferred with present incapacity for pleasure. The middle-aged, plunged deep in the affairs of mere existence, hear of past Christmas observances as of an ideal life devoutly to be desired but unattainable, like the fairy land of childhood; while the imagination of the young is excited by customs picturesque in themselves, and having their coarseness veiled by the distance from which they are viewed. On all hands, therefore, the cry goes up that Christmas is not what it used to be; that a prosaic age has removed from the great Feast every element of poetry and left nothing but the gratification of animal appetites. Influenced by this impression, we do all we can to invest the conventional symbols of Christmas past with a kind of sacredness. The Yule Log, the Wassail Bowl, the troops of mummers, the Lord of Misrule, and such like, are now as idealised as the age of so-called chivalry, when the highest function a man could discharge was to wear a golden spur and kill as many other men as possible. With reference to the real truth of the matter, no one disputes that a great change has come over Christmas observance; and the only question is whether it be for the better. Generally speaking, all change that is not a mere fluctuation means progress towards good. This is a universal law, but it scarcely need enter into present consideration. The more important fact is that, even while admitting the poetry and picturesqueness of old-world festivities, we cannot work out the problem of reconciling them with modern life. In some parts of the country vestiges of Christmas past still remain. But among those who read Sir Walter Scott's glowing lines on Christmas with a thrill of sympathetic emotion, how many take to their hearts the rustic caroller with his "Joys of Mary?" How much sympathetic emotion is excited in London streets on Christmas morning by the lugubrious vocalist from the Seven Dials as, with an eye to every kitchen-window on both sides of the way, he trolls forth "God rest you, merry gentlemen?" And when the wassailers come out with their ribbon-decked bowl, or the mummers with their fantastic attire and still more fantastic drama—as even now they sometimes do in the merry West—who, save the rural publicans, regards them as other than nuisances worthy to be put down by the county police? There is no reason to believe that these representatives of Christmas in the olden time are worse than their forerunners, but, on the contrary, we find every inducement to consider them a great deal better. At any rate they show us the most tolerable of ancient Christmas doings. What the least tolerable were can be gathered from Strutt, and the indignant outpourings of the Puritans who put them down with a hand so strong and sturdy. In our day the Lord of Misrule and his gang, to say nothing of the Boy Bishop and his train of mock ecclesiastics, would be as much an anachronism as a Knight of the Middle Ages on a modern battle-field, and as certainly handed over to the nearest constable as that Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert would be "sent to the rear" for masquerading. But while all this is true, it cannot be said that advancing civilisation, after sweeping away abuses, has substituted much in its place. As regards Christmas observances, time is simply destructive and not reformatory. It has taken away and not replaced; knocked down and not built up. What, for example, have we in the room of the quaint old carols, as archaic in construction as they doubtless were rude in performance? Our modern Christmas music is represented by the intolerable and nocturnal noises of the gentlemen with cornets and trombones, who usually stand under the windows of a public-house, but who, at Christmas time, call themselves Waits. True, some attempts have been made in recent years to revive the practice of open-air Carol singing, but there is no evidence to show that the revival has any genuine vitality; while as regards the pantomime—a modern substitute for the mystery-plays and dramatic representations of old—everybody knows that it is fast losing such distinctiveness as it once had, and becoming merely an occasion for a special show of stage magnificence. There is, perhaps, cause to regret, not that the revelries and amusements formerly prevalent at Christmas have passed away, but that nothing equally distinctive has taken their place. The year is reduced to a dead level, and the people, having no other resource, are driven to keep feasts by an extra measure of eating and drinking. Remedy there is none. The time has gone by when it was possible to unite all classes in the same social pursuit, and we are living in an age when society does not provide its own amusements, but leaves the work to be done by men to whom it stands in the place of a trade.

The singular forms taken by festival amusements in olden England must be more or less well known to every reader, who does not need telling that they were often the natural products of a coarse and licentious time. But offensive as these observances must be to us, they compare favourably with others in vogue at the same period on the Continent, and especially in France. One hundred and fifty years ago Monsieur du Tilliot, a gentleman in attendance upon the Duc de Berry, collected into a volume,* embellished with capital engravings, all the particulars he could discover of the astonishing institution called the Feast of Fools—the English analogues of which are, of course, the Lord of Misrule, as far as he intruded into the Church, and the Boy Bishop. Those who may be fortunate enough to acquire this now rare work will have spread out before them a representation of old-world amusement that demands some faith in the acceptor. But the authorities cited by M. du Tilliot are too strong for doubt, and leave us in a condition of wonder and amazement at the mingled childishness, folly, and worse, which marked a time of popular rejoicing centuries ago. Much learning has been expended in efforts to show that the Fête des Foux, the Fête d'Ane, and other kindred solemnities, were the pagan saturnalia adopted by Christianity; but without stopping to debate this question, let us see by the light of one of M. du Tilliot's MSS. how far the Church at one time sanctioned such proceedings. The fête began at Christmas-tide by the election of an abbé du clergé, the electors being (we now refer to the town of Viviers) the canons and choir of the cathedral. This done, and a "Te Deum" sung, the mock dignitary was carried on men's shoulders to the chapter-house, and there received standing by the higher ecclesiastics, even by the Bishop if he chanced to be present. More singing followed, and afterwards a procession took place, which was repeated every day during the octave. But on St. Stephen's, St. John's, and Innocents' Day, a higher dignitary appeared, in the person of the Fool Bishop, who, though really a humble officer of the Church, was vested in episcopal robes, seated on the episcopal throne, and assisted at Mass in the episcopal capacity. At the close of the Office, silence was proclaimed, the choir responding "Deo gratias," and the Fool Bishop pronounced the Blessing, his almoner afterwards granting, in doggerel verse, certain pretended indulgences. Even this burlesque of sacred things was not the worst. Stages were erected outside the churches, whereon the choir and clergy enacted licentious plays as well as mysteries, and processions marched through the towns, the members of which failed not by speech and action to excite the laughter of the mob. In point of fact, nothing can be conceived more horrible than the transactions carried on in the name of public rejoicing, some even provoking the Synod of Angers (1595) to describe them as things of which it is a shame for a man to speak or write. In all these doings music played a distinguished part. The full capacity of the church choirs was taxed to honour a Christian saturnalia, and to the solemn Gregorian tones the most blasphemous doggerel was sung with unction. Eventually matters were carried so far as to scandalise even authorities ready to tolerate anything that kept the people in good humour. Decree after decree against the sacerdotal worship of Folly was therefore issued, and, after a long struggle, the nuisance abated.

But this Revelry of Fools was not confined to the Church. Companies of gentlemen and others were formed into societies, as at Cleves, every member being bound to wear a Fool embroidered in silver on his clothing. In Flanders and the north of France Christmas revelry took the form of a Feast of Asses, and of La Mère-folle, whose function it was to teach young Fools to sing and dance. Music had a great part in the Flemish celebrations, especially burlesque music, the performers representing asses, wolves, apes, foxes, and other animals. The more sober Flemish mind, however, could not be satisfied with folly alone, and it must be said for the village theatres of the Low Countries that they presented features we would gladly see reproduced now. Every town and village had its guild of rhetoric—which arose upon the ruins of the old mystery stage—and had, likewise, its impresario, whose business was to prepare and superintend public performances on such feast days as Christmas and Easter. Into the working of these theatres, a learned Fleming, M. Straeten,* has made exhaustive inquiry, and the result is one of singular interest, as well as adapted to excite our respect for a people not generally reckoned among gifted races. The village impresario, according to M. Straeten, was at once author, player, director, prompter, scenic artist, costumier, machinist, and orchestral leader, for at all times he had a band of some sort under him.

He trained the performers, who, often unable to read, were visited at their places of employment and taught their "lines" by ear, and upon him alone therefore rested the glory or the shame his stage acquired. As for his artists, they were not seldom workers in the fields. No women, it should be pointed out, were allowed to take part, so that often a man came from the plough and exchanged his soil-stained garments for the robe of Marie Stuart, or even, mayhap, of the Virgin Mary. The female population, however, had their revenge for exclusion by forming guilds of their own, and performing amongst themselves scenes from Scripture and the lives of the saints. More often than not the rustic stage was erected against the wall of the church, or in a meadow near at hand, and around it, with its simple appliances, gathered the entire country-side to witness a religious play, or, perhaps, a "morality"; occasionally a farce redolent of the coarseness of the time. Some of the dramas were decidedly pretentious. Take, for example, one entitled "Domitien," which seems to have been modelled upon Greek form, since it had a part for a chorus embracing substantially the functions of the choragus. Thus, in the first act a choir of soldiers sang the praise of princes. In the second the blindness of superstition was musically set forth, and in the third another chorus attributed the decadence of Rome to the worship of false gods. Incidental music, too, was often introduced, where the business of the play allowed. Thus, in the drama of "Clovis," a solemn "Te Deum" celebrated the baptism of the King by the Archbishop of Rheims, and, occasionally, tableaux were presented to the accompaniment of vocal and instrumental strains. If it be asked what sort of an orchestra was available on these festive occasions, and whether the music has come down to us, the only possible answer is not quite satisfactory. There is, however, some evidence on both heads from which the rest must be assumed. The instruments commonly employed were the trumpet, hautboy, flute, fife, and tambour, and it is curious to note that each town had its favourite, using it on solemn occasions such as proclamations and the like. The cornemuse and lute were also in vogue at these festivals; the flageolet is spoken of in some documents of the period, while a passage in a drama of later time makes mention of clarionets, bassoons, horns, and violins. But, perhaps, the best idea of the village orchestras can be gained from a passage in an old religious play, spoken by King David to his train on arriving at Mount Tabor: "Play, minstrels and tambours, my three hundred harps, and my three hundred trumpets, drums, viols, guitars, psalterions, lutes and kettledrums, organs and cymbals, and you singers of symphonies." Most probably the rustic dramatist mentions here the instruments he best knew, and the conclusion is supported by a passage in another drama: "Such love to hear the melodies of the organ, flute, psalterion, harp, violin, rebec, kettledrums, lute and guitar." As regards the music, only fragments have come down to us, but we know that it was employed (as already pointed out) in the manner of the Greek chorus; hymns being sung, both sacred and secular, in praise of God, or the heroes of the drama, or by way of enforcing the lessons conveyed in the story.

In this manner, far removed from the enormities of a Feast of Fools, or the stupid antics of a Lord of Misrule, the grave Flemings, albeit not without occasional licence, kept their solemn feasts; and it is barely possible to exaggerate the influence for good which exercises so adapted to stimulate thought and imagination must have had upon the populace. But we should not be hard upon those forms of amusement which gave the loosest rein to folly. In our day of intellectual activity, when the meanest can for a penny have before him a summary of what is going on all the world over, we are unable to understand how monotonous and limited were the lives of our forefathers. By the way, when the existence of the Feast of Fools was threatened, certain conservatives of the time put forward a plea on their behalf touching this very point. They said in effect, speaking for the clerical actors: "We must have some relief from the endless round of Divine service. Folly is natural to man, and born with him, wherefore it must sometimes be allowed to run its course. This is why we give up a few days to buffooneries, after the relief of which we return full of joy and fervour to the service of religion." As with these priests so with the people, whose lives were really bounded by the horizon of their homes. Human nature could not endure such terrible monotony, and from time to time sought change and variety in revels as free as ordinary existence was limited and restrained. Obviously, to that state of things we never can return; and in proportion as mental culture extends so will the sobriety and self-restraint with which popular feasts, as far as they are observed at all, be kept. "And thus," sighs a lover of the good old times, "the world is to become more dreary and unpicturesque than ever!" Not so. Only the locality of life and animation and diversion has been changed. It has been removed from the village green and the rustic stage to the mind of every man who is abreast of the age, and there, not an occasional, but a perpetual feast is kept.

Some time ago we drew attention to the practice of defacing books which are put into the hands of visitors at the Opera with advertisements from various tradesmen; and we also said that in concert-programmes this custom seemed gradually creeping in. Whether our remarks may have had any effect, we know not; but certainly in recent Opera-books we have not observed the same cause for complaint. If, however, in the metropolis this objectionable method of appealing to the public is dying out, we cannot see any reform in some country towns we could name; for a "Book of words" lately forwarded to us is a curiosity in this respect. On the outside we are told that it is the programme of a concert; but the first page announces that somebody "Brothers" are "now showing selections of new Winter Dress Materials, consisting of the latest novelties in French Fabrics," &c. Then the names of the vocal pieces to be sung by such artists as Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Thurley Beale, are surrounded on all sides by advertisements of "Mourning Bonnets," "Boots and Shoes," and a "Smoking Mixture at 4d. and 5d. per oz.;" the name of one lady, who keeps a "Ladies' and Children's Outfit Warehouse," being printed so prominently at the top of the page as to make us believe that she took part in the programme immediately before Mr. Santley's song, "Nazareth." Added to this there are pieces of coloured paper with advertisments sewn into the body of the book, so that we are actually compelled to dive under these to find out the name of the next performer. Surely, even if we are obliged to be surrounded by advertisements in railway carriages, and stared at from the walls by representations of magnified heads and shoulders in our daily walks, we might at least be free from these inflictions in the concert-room.

In Professor Macfarren's recent address to the students of the Royal Academy of Music, speaking of the ill effects of mere pupils striving after what is termed "originality," he said: "Thoughts need manipulation, exercise, development, quite as much as the fingers of a player or the vocal organs of a singer; and when one has learned to think, when one can dispose of one's thoughts at discretion, then, if the mind of the thinker have some individuality itself, have something different from the minds of other men, the means have been attained for the expression of that individuality; but he who in the first instance aims to be unlike his fellows becomes eccentric, angular, peculiar, possibly ugly, but by all means ungenial." The history of music proves to us how profoundly true are these remarks. All our great writers have based their early compositions upon the models bequeathed to them by their predecessors; and the "originality" of their genius has been developed as their power in art-work has increased. In spite of these incontrovertible facts, however, the youngest of our musical fledglings is constantly blamed for commencing his attempts at composition in the idiom of his time. His writing is sound, it is asserted; his themes are well wrought out, he shows that he is steadily and surely grasping the science of instrumentation; but he is wanting in "originality." May it not be truly said that he who is perpetually searching after this qualification is merely proving that he has it not naturally? Many of the works we are now condemned to hear are the outgrowth of this false training. We do not by any means say that music of a high character should be "pretty," but there is no occasion to go to the opposite extreme and make it "ugly."

Now that "People's Concerts" are firmly established in the metropolis, it appears necessary to bestow some little attention upon what should be "People's music." Years ago M. Jullien established a name in this country by acting upon the notion that cheap concerts before a large audience might pay as well as dear concerts before a small audience; and, although he allowed his visitors to walk about as freely as if they were at an open-air performance, and offered every facility for "refreshment," he succeeded in making many persons acquainted with the works of the great masters who, but for his exertions in the cause, might never have heard them. But to attract the multitude he found it necessary (or at least thought it so) to degrade his programme to the level of his hearers, rather than to lift them up to the level of his programme; and the consequence was that a vast quantity of trashy compositions were given, accompanied with certain "effects," of which the less said the better. The craving for these effusions (if such craving ever existed) has, however, now passed away; but in banishing such works from our cheap concerts we must be careful that we do not replace them by compositions equally antagonistic, though in another form, with real art. Bright Overtures, the standard—but not the most recondite—Symphonies, and good sterling vocal music, should at first be the fare provided for those who have not yet educated themselves to listen to the more elaborate creations of the great composers. Flashy solos and "Royalty" songs are as bad in their way as M. Jullien's "British Army Quadrille"; and it behoves us, therefore, to see that, in ceasing to be ruled by our audiences, we do not become ruled by our performers.

There can be little doubt that, as a rule, a composer is pleased with his own music; and we may also take it for granted that a teacher who publishes his theory of instruction believes in it himself. Presuming that these are truths generally admitted, what possible occasion can there be for writing letters to assert the fact whenever reviewers venture to differ from authors in opinion? And yet we are inundated with communications from those whose works have not been noticed with unqualified favour urging us to allow them space to tell our readers that, as our estimate of their publications does not agree with that of their authors, we must be wrong. If we hint that a progression in harmony is faulty or disagreeable, we are informed that the composer has tried it over again, and likes it very much. If we take exception to a certain method of tuition, a stinging letter from the inventor of the system reminds us that we have incurred the wrath of the writer, and must be prepared to brave the consequences. A short time ago a reprint of one of our reviews (in which we had the presumption to state our convictions) was forwarded to us with annotations from the author, and accompanied by a letter in which occurs this remarkable sentence: "Had your critic made an exertion, he could have written a much more sarcastic and less rational review." We certainly can understand how, had we been so inclined, we might, with some additional trouble, have been "more sarcastic"; but how extra exertion would have made us "less rational" passes our comprehension.

Our American contemporaries are just now very busy with Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan, and one of them gives a droll account of the reception awarded to the "Pinaforists" by a fleet of hired steamers off Sandy Hook. The day was bitterly cold, but, despite a thermometer "below the Antarctic Continent," large numbers of people went off to meet the illustrious visitors, every vessel in the motley squadron being dressed with American and English flags, and having on board a "Pinafore" band and chorus. The Standard "Pinafore" sent two tugs, and the Church Choir "Pinafore" one; another hailing from the Aquarium, another from Chickering Hall, another from Lexington Avenue, and another from some place where a German version of the operetta is played. All these might have made a gallant show under an admiral, but as each steamer went its own way they somehow got mixed up with the regular shipping, and so the effect was lost. The bands and choirs were more successful with their selections from the great work of the honoured guests—or rather they would have been but for a "pestilent little tug," sent out by the San Francisco Minstrels, and carrying a flag inscribed with the terrible legend, "No Pinafore." The mission of this tug, like that of the rift within the lute, was to spoil the music, and it did its work with all the perseverance and success of a first-class steam whistle. Whenever a band played or a chorus sang, the steam whistle of the Minstrels shrieked its loudest, and so were Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan escorted into New York Bay.

Future premiers prix at the Paris Conservatoire, who may be tempted to evade their obligations to the State which has educated them, will assuredly pause and reflect upon what happened to Mdlle. Vaillant for breaking her bond. This young lady on leaving the institution should have limited her services for a time to French Opera-houses, but, tempted by a higher salary, ran away to Belgium, where she captivated the public, and got married to a baritone named Couturier. Mdlle. Vaillant, or Madame Couturier as she must now be called, probably thought that the government of a great country would not trouble itself about so small a person as herself. But she was soon undeceived. M. Jules Ferry prosecuted her for breach of contract and obtained an award of 15,000 francs and costs, without payment of which Madame Couturier could not safely return to France. She did return, however, accepting an engagement at Marseilles, and was there waited upon by the agents of the Minister. Madame Couturier must pay, so ran the decision, and after some parley a regular convention has been drawn up between the "high contracting parties"; the lady and her husband engaging to accept the judgment of the Court, and to pay the damages and costs at the rate of 400 francs for each month in which she sings once or more at a French or foreign theatre. In about three years' time, therefore, provided Madame Couturier has constant engagements, she will be free of the penalty exacted by her offended country. Let us hope that the correction will do her good, and be a warning to all who may feel disposed to imitate her escapade.

WE reprint the following advertisement from a recent provincial newspaper:—

EASY TRICKS ON THE VIOLIN.—How to produce imitations of the Human Voice, the Cries of the Barnyard Fowls, and the Scotch Bagpipes, by a simple Method. Music, including two splendid Marches, and full instructions, price 1s. 6d.

We have lately been forced to listen to many musical effects which may certainly be termed "tricks," but have not yet been accustomed to call them so. "Programme music," however, which already includes, amongst other realistic sounds, the rattling of the bones of skeletons, may shortly call into active service the accomplishments of the author of the above advertisement. The "Farmyard Symphony" would be an excellent vehicle for the introduction of the cries of various animals; and in the development of the subject it might be possible to include other noises never yet attempted. We do not know whether the "splendid Marches" are characterised by any of the tricks mentioned, but can imagine that the vain-glory of many an advancing army might be aptly illustrated by the crowing of a cock.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

IT seems curious that the only novelty we have to record at this establishment during the past month should be the appearance of the Royal Spanish Ballet Troupe, the exceptional talent of these dancers being, strangely enough, exhibited for the first time between the acts of "Don Giovanni." A wise policy, which we should be glad to see more generally adopted, has been the casting of various prime donne for the principal characters of the stock operas. The impression created by Mdlle. Lido as Michaela, in Bizet's "Carmen," has not been increased by her assumption of Elvira, in "Don Giovanni"; but she fails in good company; for, although we have lately had many representatives of this part, few have been equal to its requirements. We must say, however, that her singing of the difficult music of Queen Marguerite, in "Les Huguenots" (her services having been enlisted at a very short notice, in consequence of the indisposition of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska), was in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. Signor Tecchi, as Don José, in "Carmen," has much improved; and Mr. Carleton, who replaced Signor Pantaleoni as the Bull-fighter, deserves a word of praise for his intelligent singing, although his voice has scarcely sufficient power to fill so large a house. Little can be said in favour of Madame Pappenheim's assumption of the heroine in Verdi's "Aïda." She is a painstaking artist; but the character is out of her line, and the recollection of her predecessors in the part no doubt somewhat militated against her success. Signor Fancelli was warmly received on his return to the establishment, and his excellent singing has materially strengthened the cast of the many operas in which he has appeared, his Sir Huon, in "Oberon," having created a marked effect. The 29th ult. was announced as the last night of the Autumn season; but as a short Winter season is to commence on the 1st inst., it is possible that Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," both of which were promised, may still be produced.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE concert of the 1st ult. opened with a very excellent performance of the familiar Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn. The novelties of the afternoon were a Prelude and Fugue (MS.) for orchestra by Mr. F. Davenport, and a selection from Wagner's "Meistersinger," arranged for concert use. Mr. Davenport's composition is cleverly written, and shows great mastery of the resources of counterpoint; but it is interesting rather as a scholastic exercise than as abstract music, and its general effect is dry. The "Meistersinger" selection includes the Introduction to the third act, the Dance of Apprentices, and the Procession of the Mastersingers—three movements which, though musically interesting, suffer materially, as might be expected with Wagner, when heard apart from the stage. Miss Bessie Richards made her first appearance as a pianist at the Saturday concerts on the same afternoon, in Hiller's concerto in F sharp minor. The young lady has decided talent, but is at present by no means up to the standard of attainment which would justify her appearance at a Crystal Palace concert. Her performance was altogether wanting in finish; and she ought to study carefully before presenting herself again to the public. The vocalists were Madame Schuch-Proska and Miss Hope Glenn; the former confirmed the good opinion previously formed concerning her; while the latter, a débutante, pleased by her sympathetic voice and expressive singing.

Mozart's symphony in C major (No. 6), which was given on the following Saturday, though seldom heard, and much less generally known than the famous "Jupiter" symphony in the same key, is hardly less characteristic of its composer than the great work just named. It is a stream of lovely melodies from beginning to end, the slow movement being especially charming. It has not the grandeur of a Beethoven symphony, but approaches rather to the artlessness of Haydn. The other orchestral numbers at this concert were the "Leonora" overture (No. 3) and a very weak Gavotte for strings by Bazzini. Miss Anna Mehlig gave a really superb rendering of Rubinstein's interesting concerto in D minor—one of his best works; and Miss Carlotta Elliot and Mr. Edward Lloyd supplied the vocal music—the young lady, who appeared for the first time at these concerts, creating a very favourable impression.

The first performance in this country of Joachim Raff's eighth symphony was the special feature of the concert on the 15th. There are probably few living composers who write more than Raff; and there are certainly none who are more unequal in the quality of their productions. The eighth symphony, entitled "Frühlingsklänge," is one of the weakest and least interesting of its composer's works. It contains much clever writing; but, with the exception of the slow movement, there is hardly an idea in the symphony which is worth the trouble of treating. Where it is not commonplace and vulgar, it is mostly dry and laboured, and in parts even positively ugly. But for the fact that it is the latest symphony by one of the most prominent composers of the day, it is difficult to imagine why it was produced at the Crystal Palace. In spite of a remarkably fine performance, it was but coolly received by the audience. Mdlle. Janotha had been announced as the pianist on this afternoon, but as she was prevented from appearing, her place was taken by Miss Anna Mehlig, who played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor in her usual finished manner. Mr. Santley was the vocalist at this concert, which concluded with Gounod's pleasing, but not very striking, ballet music to "Polyeucte."

The programme of the concert on the 22nd included Schumann's Rhenish symphony (No. 3, in E flat), Dr. Swinnerton Heap's Concert Overture in F, written for the last Birmingham Festival, and Liszt's transcription for orchestra of a march from Schubert's "Divertissement Hongrois," as the orchestral numbers. Dr. Heap's overture is a well-written composition, carefully scored and pleasing, but of no great originality. Liszt's effective and brilliant arrangement of Schubert's march has, we believe, been occasionally heard in London, but had not been previously given at these concerts. Madame Arabella Goddard played Mozart's lovely concerto in D minor, with the brilliancy to which we are accustomed from her; but her reading of the work seemed to us cold and unsympathetic. The vocal music at this concert was supplied by Miss Robertson, who sang "Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni," and a vocal Waltz by Thomas, the latter a very pleasing composition, but by no means suited to a Crystal Palace concert.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The performances of this institution, which during the twenty-one years of its existence has rapidly and most deservedly gained the popular support to which it appealed, were resumed on the 3rd ult., when a numerous audience assembled to render homage to the familiar artists who made their appearance at St. James's Hall on the occasion. Although the taste and the intelligent appreciation for abstract music may be more widely spread among the specifically musical nations of the Continent, it is nevertheless a fact that the "Popular Concerts," instituted by Mr. Chappell, occupy a unique place in the musical life, not only of this metropolis but elsewhere. The Paris Concerts Populaires afford no parallel, being devoted chiefly to the performance of orchestral and choral works, while the annual chamber-concerts given at the numerous musical centres of Germany, Austria, Holland, and elsewhere, are generally carried on by a few local artists, however excellent and however meritorious their efforts for the diffusion of musical taste of the highest order. It is the cosmopolitan character of Mr. Chappell's institution which renders it unique,—the fact that during each season it affords its frequenters the opportunity of hearing the classical masterpieces of chamber-music interpreted by the foremost artists of every nationality. Considering the success by which these Concerts have hitherto been attended, it is scarcely surprising that they should assume a somewhat conservative character as regards the works performed during the season, although we think we are interpreting rightly the general bias of the audience in advocating a more liberal concession to the claims of living composers than has of late years been accorded them. Among the artists whose appearance is announced during the present season we again notice with regret the absence of the name of Madame Schumann.

The opening Concert of the present, twenty-second, season was inaugurated with a spirited performance of Haydn's string Quartett in B flat (Op. 50, No. 1) not previously heard here, a fact which is scarcely surprising considering the numerous similar works which flowed from the prolific pen of that composer. Although not to be classed with the best of these works, the quartett referred to is distinguished, like the rest, by that transparent clearness of design and harmonious development of the parts which characterise classical art-work. The performance was in excellent hands, being intrusted to the familiar quartett-party, presided over in turn by two of the most eminent violinists of our time, and consisting in the present instance of Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, their first appearance on the platform becoming the signal of a most hearty demonstration of welcome. Signor Piatti's noble tone and artistic conception were displayed to the best advantage in Rubinstein's Sonata in D major for violoncello and pianoforte, as were the eminent qualifications of Mdlle. Janotha, who presided at the latter instrument. This was the fifth performance at these Concerts of Rubinstein's Sonata, one of the most coherent and interesting works of its impulsive composer. The only instrumental solo performance of the evening was a Chaconne for violin by Vitali, rendered by Madame Norman-Néruda in the exquisite style to which she has long accustomed us. Beethoven's pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 70), admirably played by Mdlle. Janotha, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti, brought the interesting programme to a worthy conclusion. Miss Lillian Bailey was the vocalist, and materially contributed to the enjoyment of the evening by singing an aria from Handel's opera, "Allessandro," and the familiar Cavatina, "Und ob die Wolke sie verhülle," from "Der Freischütz," the effect of the latter being enhanced by Signor Piatti playing the violoncello obbligato. The lady's fresh voice and pure intonation, as well as her unostentatious yet intelligent rendering of the two airs, so widely differing in style, deservedly met with the unqualified appreciation of the audience. Mr. Zerbini ably performed the office of Conductor.

At the second evening Concert of last month (the 10th ult.) Mdlle. Janotha was again to have been the pianist, but was unable to appear in consequence of indisposition, her place being taken by Mdlle. Anna Mehlig, whose performance of Haydn's variations in F minor for pianoforte alone elicited much applause. The lady was also associated with Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti in the capital rendering of Schumann's pianoforte Trio in D minor, of the characteristic merits of which we have before had occasion to speak in connection with these Concerts. The Concert opened with Spohr's string Quartett in A major (Op. 93), in which Madame Norman-Néruda had a special opportunity of displaying her eminent qualities as first violinist, the part assigned to that instrument in what is essentially a virtuoso-quartett being throughout predominant. That Spohr, himself the greatest violinist of his time, should have thus far strained the artistic economy essential to the particular art form in question, is scarcely surprising, although it can hardly be said that in this, as in several others of his "solo-quartetts," he has added to the number of classical chamber works. They require at any rate the skill of a consummate first violinist to be truly appreciated, and in that respect the performance we speak of certainly left nothing to be desired. Haydn's Quartett in B flat (Op. 55, No. 3) was the concluding number, the executants being Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Vocal solos by Buononcini, Salvator Rosa, and Handel respectively added an historical interest to the programme, and were well suited to the almost masculine timbre of the voice of the singer, Madame Cummings. Sir Julius Benedict was the Conductor.

Beethoven's string Quartett in C major (Op. 59) was produced as the commencing number of the third Concert of the season (the 17th ult.), and received an admirable interpretation at the hands of Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze. The quartett is one of three dedicated to Count Rasoumowsky, and reflects, like its companions, the mature artistic consciousness which characterises what is generally recognised by this classifying age as the second period in the development of the composer's genius. Sublime grandeur of conception, dignity and grace, combined with an absolute control over matters of form and symmetry, distinguish the works of the giant-musician at this period, and form the leading attributes of the quartett in question. Mr. Charles Hallé was the pianist of the evening, and with his wonted skill and lucidity of exposition played, as his solo performance, Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 29, No. 3), while at the conclusion of the Concert he joined Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Pezze in the execution, con amore, of Haydn's pianoforte Trio in E major. Nor should we omit the admirable and, as a matter of course, much-applauded rendering on the part of the lady violinist of Handel's Violin Sonata in A major (Op. 26), which, having elicited an inevitable encore, was supplemented by a number from Spohr's "Salonstücke." Miss Hope Glenn created a very favourable impression in her rendering of songs by Haydn, Schubert, and Carissimi. Signor Pezze had, it should be added, taken the place of Signor Piatti on this occasion, owing to the sudden indisposition of that gentleman.

At the last evening Concert of the past month Mdlle. Mehlig was again the pianist, her solo performance being Weber's Sonata in C major (Op. 24), one of the most characteristic and masterly of the composer's similar productions. The Concert opened with Brahms's Sextett in G major, for double complement of violins, violas, and violoncellos, which had already been previously heard at this institution, the executants being Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, Burnett, Pezze, and Piatti. The programme also included three duets for violoncello and pianoforte by F. W. Davenport, in the performance of which Mdlle. Mehlig was associated with Signor Piatti, as well as Haydn's pianoforte Trio in D major (No. 21), executed by Mdlle. Mehlig, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Pezze. Miss Lillian Bailey was again the vocalist, and contributed an Aria from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Lieder by Schubert and Mendelssohn. Sir Julius Benedict conducted.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The first Subscription Concert of the season was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 4th ult., the work selected for the occasion being the Cantata "Hereward," composed expressly for the Society by the Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout. On its own merits the composition fully deserves the care and attention bestowed upon it by every member of the Association; but, even were this not the case, as a mark of respect to an artist who has worked so zealously to bring the choir to its present state of efficiency, the opening concert of the session was certainly the most legitimate time to bring the work before the subscribers. On the occasion of the performance of the Cantata at St. James's Hall, in June last, by this Society, we entered so fully into the details of the composition that critical notice here would be unnecessary. We may say, however, that increased acquaintance with the music enabled the singers to give increased effect to the very many picturesque and highly dramatic choruses with which the work abounds. Especially were the precision and evenly balanced quality of tone in the choir observable in the choruses "Strike the harp" (with which the Bridal March is so skilfully interwoven), "Gleemen lift a tuneful strain," and the Saxon Chorus, "Weep for the Viking slain," which, although short, contains some of the best writing in the Cantata. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Marian Williams, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. Frederic King, all of whom gave the utmost effect to the solos with which they were entrusted, Mrs. Osgood singing, as she always does, with genuine pathos, Miss Williams creating a marked impression in the difficult air, "Hail, the might of woman, hail!" and Mr. Shakespeare being especially successful in the portions of the tenor music requiring real dramatic feeling. The Cantata was received throughout with the warmest applause from an audience crowding every part of the hall; and the composer, who conducted, was greeted at the conclusion of the performance with unmistakable expressions of satisfaction. A good word must be said for the small but efficient band, the whole of the elaborate accompaniments and the Bridal March being rendered with much care and intelligence.

MR. COENEN'S BRIGHTON CONCERT.

The Evening Concert given in the Dome on the 20th ult. by Mr. Willem Coenen was of a very attractive character, and notwithstanding the crowd of amusements at Brighton in the full season, drew together a very large audience. Mr. Coenen was to have been supported by Mr. Sims Reeves, but unfortunately the great tenor was too indisposed to appear. Though this amounted to a misfortune, the public, seeing what was otherwise provided, bore it with equanimity, and left the concert-room quite satisfied with their entertainment. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the many items in the programme. The nature of what was done can be inferred when we state that the list of principal vocalists comprised the names of Madame Sherrington, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Hoare, the Misses Kingsbury, Mr. Pearson, and Signor Foli; the instrumentalists being, in addition to the talented concert-giver, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Mr. Kingsbury, and Mr. Taylor; while the concerted vocal music was supplied by the Philharmonic Choir. Such a combination of talent engaged upon more or less popular selections had a result wholly needless to specify. Mr. Coenen appeared both as executant and composer. In the first capacity he played Rubinstein's "Valse Allemand," with such skill and taste that his audience—and Brighton amateurs know a pianist when they hear him—testified their satisfaction by a warm recall. As a composer, Mr. Coenen came forward with a "Caprice Concertant," written for no fewer than sixteen players upon eight pianos. Of course, a work of this kind must be considered in the light of a jeu d'esprit, and as of comparatively small practical worth, since only under very special circumstances can sixteen capable players and eight pianos be got together. A jeu d'esprit, however, has its value, direct and indirect. In the present case, it excited a good deal of curiosity and interested remark. That was its direct value; while indirectly it served to show that the composer has some of the qualifications for higher work than any by which he is yet known. It must be obvious that the nature of his prodigious score offered great temptations to over elaboration, the danger being that the main design would lose itself in a maze of details, and the general effect show monotony. But Mr. Coenen has avoided these results with surprising skill. Although each pianoforte has, substantially, an independent part, the main design stands out as clearly as possible, unobscured by excess of ornamentation; while as regards the variety which in such a work must atone for uniformity of colour, we can only say that no means of securing it could have been better devised or more successful. The themes of the Caprice, by the way, are thoroughly melodious, and if Mr. Coenen can reduce his work to the dimensions of a duet it will meet with large acceptance. The Caprice was played most admirably by sixteen lady pupils of the composer on eight Kirkman grands, and as a matter of course was enthusiastically applauded and encored.

A correspondent sends us the following account of the music at the opening ceremonial of the Sydney International Exhibition: "The first Australian International Exhibition was opened in Sydney, New South Wales, on September 17. Some months since Signor Paolo Giorza was appointed by the Commissioners Director of Music, with instructions to prepare an opening Cantata. Considerable heart-burning existed at the time amongst the local professors at this appointment without competition. The result has however proved that a good choice was made; and considering that Signor Giorza had but a few weeks to obtain the words of a suitable Ode, and to compose the music for the practice of the chorus, he is to be congratulated on having produced a very creditable work. The words of the Cantata are the composition of an Australian poet, Mr. H. Kendall. The work commences with a very short prelude for the orchestra, by which the audience are prepared for the opening bars of the first chorus, 'Songs of Morning,' in 3-4 time, which except for the beauty of the orchestral accompaniment (in which Signor Giorza throughout is very successful) does not command much admiration or evidence much originality. A few bars of recitative follow for the soprano, and lead to the chorus 'Lo, they come,' which appears the most original number of the whole work, the orchestration in particular exhibiting great taste and skill. A tenor solo, sung by Mr. Vernon Reid, is followed by airs for bass and contralto, sung respectively by Mr. T. Rainford and Miss Marie St. Clair. The latter is certainly the gem of the solo parts, and Miss St. Clair's full rich voice was effectively displayed. A short prelude for flute, oboe and clarionet, then leads to a pretty soprano solo, 'Ah! haply on some mossy slope,' well sung by Miss Moon, followed immediately by a chorus for children's voices alone, 'A gracious morning.' This was rendered by a chorus of about 250 young girls selected from the public schools, and trained by Mr. J. C. Fisher, a gentleman who has long since earned the first place in this department. The admirable precision and expression exhibited by these youthful vocalists gained for them a deserved encore. The children's chorus was accompanied on four grand pianos with eight lady performers, led by Signora Giorza. A soprano solo, sung by Mrs. Wells, concluded the third part of the Cantata. The fourth part opens solemnly—Andante religioso—with a prayer 'Father all bountiful," by a semi-choir of bass voices and chorus—and leads to the finale for principals, full chorus, and children's chorus, which would have been all the better for a little more drilling of the basses and tenors in the Allegro movement. Loud applause followed the conclusion, and at the request of his Excellency, Lord Loftus, Signor Giorza was presented to him and to the Governors of all the other Australian Colonies with him on the daïs, and received their thanks and compliments. In a short speech his Excellency then declared the building opened, and the 'Hallelujah' Chorus was sung by the choir, which consisted of about 500 members of the Sacred Choral Association, augmented by a few members of the Civil Service Musical Society. An 'Australian Anthem,' composed by Signor Giorza, for soprano and chorus, was followed by 'God save the Queen,' the whole audience rising and joining. The orchestra only consisted of forty-six performers, but was well selected and balanced, and the sound was augmented slightly by an absurdly small organ for such a building, sent out by the London Commission, and purchased by them for £600—a very bad bargain, for it arrived dirty and broken in many parts, and without any specifications, so that the builder who put it together had to work night and day to get it in order for the opening day. The general arrangements for musical performances have been one continual muddle throughout. The organ was ordered to be erected on the platform, without any sort of floor or organ chamber, and is placed in an archway roughly boarded up, so that its power is diminished in every possible way. The architect also has not paid the slightest attention to the acoustical properties of the part of the building set apart for the musical performances, and the original platform for the singers and orchestra, besides being found not half large enough, shows great ignorance of the proper shape and construction, and the additions made to enlarge it are most faulty and unsightly. The only excuse to be found for all this is the great haste in which the whole building has been run up, to be ready to open at the date fixed. The Cantata was repeated, by request, on Saturday, September 27, the first 'shilling day.' Upwards of 30,000 people were present, and everything went off with equal success. The platform arrangements for seating the chorus were under the control of Mr. W. H. Rowsell, the Hon. Sec. of the Sacred Choral Association, and Mr. S. M. Mowle, one of the Committee of Internal Arrangements, and their activity and attention contributed greatly to the comfort of the singers and the general success of the performance. The Sacred Choral Association are to give the 'Creation' on October 11, being the first of six Oratorios to be performed by them, one each month, during the continuance of the Exhibition, and a report thereof will follow by an early opportunity."

At a recent meeting of the guarantors of the Leeds Musical Festival, held in the Grand Jury-room at Leeds, Mr. Thomas Marshall in the chair, Mr. F. R. Spark, the Secretary, read a report of the provisional committee appointed by the General committee of the Festival, 1877, for the purpose of making arrangements for the triennial festival of 1880. The report stated that after overtures by the committee, Mr. Arthur Sullivan wrote to them saying: "I shall not be unwilling to write a work of the same length and character as the 'Prodigal Son,' a work occupying about an hour and a half in performance, and forming one part of a concert." This offer had been accepted by the committee, and Mr. Sullivan is now, and has been for some time past, writing an oratorio, the subject of the libretto being the Bible story of Saul and Jonathan. The report also expressed the pleasure the committee had in announcing that a new secular Cantata would be written for the Leeds Festival by Mr. J. F. Barnett, the composer of the "Ancient Mariner," the subject selected being the poem by Longfellow, "The Building of the Ship." Foreign composers had also been communicated with. M. Gounod was so deeply engaged in producing another great Opera that it was impossible for him to write for the Leeds Festival. But from Herr Raff a very pleasing letter had been received. After thanking the committee for performing his Fourth Symphony at the Leeds Festival in 1877, he said he feared he should not be able to write something new, as he was so overloaded with work. The correspondence, however, with Herr Raff was not yet closed, and the committee still hope to obtain, if not an entirely new composition, some unpublished work of the great German composer. Numerous letters have been received from composers offering works for performance at the Leeds Festival. With the exception, however, of one new orchestral piece by Mr. Thomas Wingham, of London, the provisional committee have not ventured to decide as to these offers, leaving them to the general committee. As to the guarantee fund, the report said it was a most encouraging fact that within two or three weeks after an appeal to the guarantors of 1877, no less a sum than £5,485 was guaranteed by 172 persons. Up to the present time that sum has been increased to £8,905 by 272 guarantors. This amount is nearly £1,000 beyond that subscribed for the 1877 festival in the same period of time, and £1,500 larger than the total sum guaranteed for the festival in 1874. The committee hope that the guarantee fund for next year may reach £13,000 or £14,000 before the list is closed. In conclusion, the provisional committee suggest that out of whatever surplus may be secured by the next festival a given proportion be set apart in furtherance of the festival of 1883. The report was adopted, and a general committee appointed.

At the meeting of the Musical Association on the 3rd ult., Herr Emil Behnke gave a lecture on the Mechanism of the Voice, illustrated by working models. There was an influential audience, including Mr. W. H. Cummings (in the chair), Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Madame Goldschmidt, Drs. Lennox Browne and Llewellyn Thomas, Rev. T. Helmore, Mr. E. Prout, Mr. C. E. Stephens, Mr. James Higgs, &c. Herr Behnke, in an exposition remarkable for its clearness and method, maintained that vocal tone came from the larynx only, and ridiculed the terms "head," "chest," and "falsetto," as applied to the registers. The laryngoscope, itself the invention of a musician—Signor Garcia—showed the break between the chest and falsetto. These he preferred to speak of as the thick and thin registers, because the first was produced by the vocal bands vibrating in their whole thickness, and the second by their thin edges alone vibrating. This great break took place at a certain place in absolute pitch, whether in the voices of men or of women. The region of the break was from D below the first line of the treble clef, to F sharp in the first space. The voices of men and women were not the same an octave apart, but were each of them portions of the same human voice. The head voice, as he understood it, existed only in women and boys; it was produced by one-third only of the vocal bands vibrating. The deepest and most effective respiration was that in which the midriff and ribs were both engaged. In the discussion which followed, Madame Goldschmidt asked a question as to breathing. She had always taken breath near the collar-bone. Mr. Lennox Browne complimented Herr Behnke on his successful demonstration. He was sure that the greatest physiologist, even Professor Huxley, could not have made the subject clearer. In the main he agreed with Herr Behnke's conclusions, but he regarded the false vocal cords as concerned in the production of tone. Mr. Orlando Steed explained the theory of Mr. Charles Lunn, and the chairman, in summing up, gave his own experiences of breathing and registers. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Herr Behnke, who mentioned that he had a work in preparation embodying the results of his studies.

The balance-sheet of the Festival lately held in Bristol has been issued, and is, on the whole, a very satisfactory document. It shows a surplus amounting to £402 7s. 2d.; of which however £207 19s. 6d. was directly contributed to the funds of the connected charities. Deducting this sum, there remains a profit on the actual working of the Festival, which must be a great consolation to the guarantors, if any, who put down their names not from any real interest in the thing, but because others had done so. Looking at the items set forth, it appears that £6,158 was received by sale of tickets; of which amount the principal vocalists took £1,422 15s.; Mr. Hallé and the orchestra, £1,242; hire of hall and premises, £421 16s. 6d.; general working expenses, £1,494 10s. 4d.; and manager's expenses (secretaries, clerks, police, &c.), £643 16s. 11d. Upon these figures we have only to say that the "incidentals" run up in a manner which suggests lack of economy somewhere, and especially as no more than £251 5s. 10d. was spent in advertising. But this did not occur to the members of the Festival Society, among whom nothing but congratulation prevailed, and who cheerfully voted £250 to each of the medical charities concerned. At the meeting called to consider the balance-sheet it was resolved to increase the guarantors to 500, and limit their liability to £10. The step was no doubt a wise one, but wiser still was the suggestion of Mr. R. Lang, who, seeing that the guarantors have really nothing to pay, declared that they ought to put down a guinea each as a working fund. We entirely agree with Mr. Lang, provided it be understood that the committee are at liberty to risk the whole of the fund so formed in the production of new works. On the whole, the Bristol Festival is doing well, and appears now to be firmly established.

THE prospectus of the final series of Concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall (which building it is understood will not be available for musical purposes after October next) includes an interesting selection of works from the Society's répertoire. The season will commence on Friday, the 5th inst., when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" will be given. Next in order will be the ante-Christmas performance of the "Messiah." The first Concert in the new year will be on January 16, when Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be performed; following this comes Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Spohr's "Last Judgment." "Elijah" and "St. Paul" are to be heard during the season, also Haydn's "Creation" and Costa's "Eli." The concluding performance will consist of Handel's grand choral work, "Israel in Egypt." The names of the following eminent artists appear in the list of principal vocalists: Mesdames Sherrington, Anna Williams, Osgood, and Emma Thursby (sopranos), Patey, Julia Elton, and Enriquez (contraltos), Messrs. Rigby, Cummings, Maas, and Lloyd (tenors), Santley, Lewis Thomas, Bridson and Chaplin Henry (basses). The orchestra will, as heretofore, consist of the leading members of the profession, under the able guidance of Sir Michael Costa. Mr. Willing again presides at the organ. Under the exceptional circumstances of these performances every possible effort, we are assured, will be made to render them specially memorable in the history of music, no less than in that of the Society itself.

AN elaborate work like the "Shakespeare Key"—which is to the features of Shakespeare's style what the "Concordance" is to his every word—is so essentially composed of minute detail, that a clue to each detail is essentially needed; more particularly so in the present age of rapid search and ready use, which renders indexing a valued aid more than ever recognised and demanded. The "Table of Contents" to the "Shakespeare Key" pointed out the headings of subjects treated in this work; but a still farther and more precise indication to its several particulars has been written by Mrs. Cowden Clarke, and furnished by the now printed "Index to the Shakespeare Key," which may be inserted in already purchased copies of the work, and obtained for that purpose on application to its publishers, Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., or to Messrs. Novello and Co. Future copies of the "Shakespeare Key" will have this "Index" bound up with them, but a separate copy of the "Index to Shakespeare Key" will be posted in reply to any letter containing address and two postage stamps. It is with much pleasure announced that the "Shakespeare Key" has received warmest eulogium from some of the most eminent Shakespearians now living, who have given it the same hearty welcome which the "Complete Concordance to Shakespeare" has met with for many years.

THE prospectus of the Glasgow Choral Union for the season 1879-80 announces ten Subscription Concerts, four of which will be choral and six orchestral. Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," Handel's "Messiah," selections from Mozart's "Requiem," and Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" will be given at the Choral Concerts, the choir, numbering about 400 voices, under the direction of Mr. H. A. Lambeth. The Orchestral Concerts will be conducted by Mr. August Manns, and the programme will include Goetz's Symphony in F, and several other important works not previously performed in Glasgow. The orchestra, consisting of about sixty performers, will be led by Herr Hermann Franke; and the vocalists engaged are Misses Robertson, Mary Davies, Marian Williams, Annie Marriott, and Anna Williams; Mrs. Smith, Mdlle. Friedländer, Misses Julia Elton, Helen d'Alton, and Lilly Martin; Messrs. E. Lloyd, Barton M'Guckin, Henry Guy, and Vernon Rigby; Herr Henschel, Mr. Bridson, and Signor Foli. Solo violin, Señor Sarasate; solo pianoforte, Miss Helen Hopekirk; organist, Dr. A. L. Peace. The first concert takes place on the 9th inst.

THE Annual Festival of the Church Choir Association was held in S. Paul's Cathedral on the 6th ult. As we have before stated, the music at these Festivals is composed expressly for the occasion, and the Conductor or Directors use their judgment with great discretion and impartiality in selecting composers of distinction. The two important features were, of course, the music to the Canticles and Anthem, the first being composed by Berthold Tours and the second by Henry Gadsby; and it is an undoubted fact that both these gentlemen, by the above-named compositions, have contributed valuable and important additions to the existing stock of festival music. We very much wish we had a word of praise for the performance of this excellent music. Either from want of sufficient rehearsal, or for other reasons, much unsteadiness prevailed. We fully appreciate the difficulty of managing a choir of 1,000 voices in S. Paul's Cathedral; still we feel bound to say that, with a sufficient number of carefully conducted rehearsals, a better result might be attained. Mr. W. S. Hoyte presided at the organ, and Mr. J. R. Murray conducted.

ON Tuesday evening, the 2nd inst., Herr Henschel will give a Choral and Orchestral Concert at St. James's Hall. The Concert is for the benefit of the Victoria Hospital for Children (Chelsea), and is under the immediate patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, who has promised to be present. The programme will consist of: Symphony No. 1 (C minor, Op. 68), Brahms; Duet for two Basses and Orchestra (Op. 30), Henschel (from Lord Byron's "Hebrew Songs"); "Out of Darkness" (Psalm cxxx.), for Five-part Chorus, Soli, and Orchestra (Op. 31), Henschel (first time of performance in England); Fantasia (Polish National Songs) for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Chopin (first time of performance in England); "Triumphlied" (Triumphal Hymn) for Double Chorus and Orchestra (Op. 55), Brahms (first time of performance in England). The principal vocalists announced are Miss Lillian Bailey, Messrs. Frank Boyle and Fred. King, and Herr Henschel. Mdlle. Janotha is the solo pianist, and Mr. Barnby and Herr Henschel are the Conductors.

ON the 15th ult., at Rolls Road Board School, Bermondsey, S.E., Mr. T. E. H. Bullen gave a lecture on the Chevé Method of Teaching Vocal Music. The Lecturer commenced by explaining that the only thing taught by pattern was the diatonic scale in stepwise succession. From that elementary acquirement all skill in reading at sight was built up by simple but certain means, which never failed to make persons with ordinary ability good readers of music. The exercises were rapidly sung by a pupil, the facility of the singer in taking difficult minor and modulating passages causing much astonishment. The method of teaching all chromatic and modulating intervals without any pattern from teachers or instrument was fully explained. The special means of teaching the staff notation and musical dictation were then entered into by the Lecturer, and a Hymn-tune, selected by the President, was taken down by a pupil at the first hearing. To show how young children can be taught to read music, a little girl aged four sang from note at sight exercises on the scale and on the tonic chord.

THE members of the Kilburn Musical Association gave their first Concert of the season on Monday, the 17th ult., at the Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Adolph Gollmick. The first part of the programme was devoted to Handel's "Acis and Galatea." The difficult choruses were rendered with great spirit and care, showing that the members had been very carefully trained. The solos were sung by Madame Liebhart, Miss Hüttl, Mr. Ben Davis, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. Walter F. Clare, all of whom gave great satisfaction to a crowded audience. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The most noticeable items were Madame Liebhart's rendering of "I may or may not" (encored), and Mr. Pollitzer's violin-playing of two of his own compositions (encored). Miss J. Rosse also was very successful in the songs allotted her. Mr. Oliver King gained well-merited applause for his pianoforte solo (a Ballade in A flat, by Chopin), as did also the ladies of the choir in Pinsuti's "Le Spagnole." Mrs. Wake and Mr. A. Gollmick were the accompanists.

A VERY successful Concert was given in the Vestry Hall, Turnham Green, on Thursday, October 30, in aid of the Building Fund of St. Michael's Church, Bedford Park, Chiswick. The vocalists were Miss Jenny Egerton, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Sidney Barnby, Mr. Alfred Smith, Mr. Grylls, and Mr. MacDonell. An excellent programme was well carried out. Miss Egerton gained an encore for

F. Clay's song, "The Sands of Dee," and Miss McKenzie for Barnby's "When the tide comes in" and "Twickenham Ferry." The last named lady (winner of the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship at the Royal Academy) seemed especially to win the good opinion of the audience. The pianist was Miss Lucie Cobbe, who played Bach's "Suite Française" in the first part of the programme, and "Chanson d'Amour" (Henselt), and a Tarantelle by Walter Macfarren in the second, with true artistic feeling, gaining an encore for her last piece. The room was crowded, and a sum of over £30 will be credited to the fund, after paying all expenses.

AN excellent performance of Smart's dramatic Cantata, "The Bride of Dunkerron," was given at the Grosvenor Choral Society's ninety-third monthly Concert, in the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 21st ult., the band and chorus numbering about 130 performers. Madame Worrell gave a capital rendering of the music of the Sea Maiden, particularly distinguishing herself in the air, "Our home shall be," and the duet, "Where yon sapphire star," with Mr. Alfred Kenningham, who sang the music of Dunkerron with great taste. Mr. Henry Cross delivered the Sea King's music in a careful manner. The choruses were given with remarkable dramatic force and precision. A miscellaneous selection formed the second part of the programme. The band accompanied throughout, and also gave the Overture to "Der Freischütz." Mr. Henry Baker conducted.

A HARVEST Festival was held in St. Mary's, Seymour Street, Euston Square, on Friday, the 14th ult. The hymns, "Now thank we all our God," "Lord of the harvest, once again," and "We plough the fields and scatter," were sung, as arranged by W. H. Monk. Psalms 65 (Woodward in D), 147 (Cooke in G), and 150 (Crotch in C), were chanted. The Cantate Domino and the Deus misereatur (Goss in C) were sung; also the anthem "The Lord hath done great things" (H. Smart). Mr. T. Biddlecome presided at the organ with his usual skill. The choirs of St. Mark's Church (St. John's Wood) and of St. Thomas's Church (Camden Town) kindly assisted in the service. An appropriate sermon upon the subject of praise and the use of music in divine worship was preached by the Rev. Henry White, of the Chapel Royal, Savoy.

MR. KUHE'S Annual Musical Festival at Brighton will commence on February 17. The only new composition announced is a Biblical Pastorale, "The First Christmas Morning," by Mr. Henry Leslie. Among the works already familiar will be performed Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," Costa's "Naaman," Sullivan's "The Prodigal Son," Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." The following vocalists are already engaged: Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Robertson, Miss M. Davies, Miss De Fonblanque, and Mrs. Osgood; Madame Patey, Miss Orridge, and Madame Antoinette Sterling; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Barton M'Guckin, Bernard Lane, Shakespeare, Vernon Rigby, Edward Lloyd, Foli, King, Bridson, Lewis Thomas, and Santley.

ON Thursday evening, the 20th ult., the amateur orchestral society known as the "Wandering Minstrels" gave a very successful Concert at the Horns Assembly Room, Kennington, in aid of the Repairing Fund of the Bolton Street National Schools, Camberwell New Road. Under the conductorship of Lord Gerald Fitzgerald the orchestral portion of the programme, consisting of several overtures, selections, &c., was very commendably executed. Miss Evelyn D'Egville played with success the Scherzo from Litolff's Concerto Symphonique, No. 4, and sang Gounod's "Oh, that we two were maying." Mr. D'Egville also elicited warm manifestations of approval by his violin solo, Obertass, Op. 19 (Wieniawski). Mr. S. Heilbut sang "The better land" (Cowen), and Pinsuti's "I fear no foe." The room was well filled.

THE hall of Messrs. Neumeyer and Co., the eminent pianoforte manufacturers, in Hart Street, Bloomsbury, was opened on the 5th ult. with a grand Concert and conversazione. The programme was judiciously selected from the works of Gounod, Brahms, Gluck, Hoffmann, &c., including the celebrated "Minnespiel," for mixed voices, with pianoforte duet accompaniment by the last-named composer, which was most satisfactorily executed, as indeed were the whole of the pieces in the Concert. The acoustic properties and the elegant decorations of the hall, which will hold about 400 people, fully justifies the expectation that the Neumeyer Hall will prove a useful and most welcome addition to our public edifices. The splendid grand pianoforte, especially manufactured for this hall, called forth general admiration.

A HARVEST Thanksgiving Service was held at the Wesleyan Church, Blackheath, on October 29, consisting of Evening Service, with Tallis's Responses; special Psalms to Elvey and Dr. Hiles in A; Cantate and Deus, Goss in C, for voices in unison; special Hymns, including Barnby's "Harvest-tide thanksgiving;" Anthem, "The Lord hath done great things" (Smart), the solo in which was admirably sung by Miss Herring. The Choruses were efficiently rendered by the choir and reflected credit on all concerned. The organist of the church, Mr. W. Langsford Guest, presided at the Organ. An appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Megarry, and collections made on behalf of the Church Funds.

THE Grove House Choral Society, formed in connection with the establishment of Messrs. Spencer, Turner, and Boldero, is eminently deserving of credit for the spirited management which has distinguished its career, for the high degree of efficiency attained, and for the excellence of the entertainments provided. The first Concert of the season took place on Friday evening, the 7th ult., at the Omega Hall, Alpha Road, Lisson Grove. The principal vocalists were Miss Matilda Roby and Miss Eliza Thomas (R.A.M.), Mr. E. Bryant and Mr. Slack. Herr Trousselle presided at the pianoforte and officiated as accompanist, and Mr. Coburn conducted.

THE Brixton Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's Oratorio, "Jephtha," at Angell Town Institution, on Thursday evening, the 13th ult., under the Conductorship of Mr. William Lemare. The choral numbers were uniformly well sung, eliciting marks of approbation from the large audience present. The solo vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Hutchinson. Orchestral accompaniments were performed by a small band, and Mr. John Harrison presided at the Organ. We understand that Mr. Gadsby's Cantata, "The Lord of the Isles," will be performed at the next Concert.

MR. C. L. GRUNEISEN, who died on the 1st ult., in his seventy-third year, was well known as a musical critic, having held this post for many years on various newspapers, his latest appointment in that capacity being on the Athenæum. He is said to have been mainly instrumental in founding the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, in 1847; and was intimate with most of the eminent foreign composers, Meyerbeer having intrusted to him the score of his Opera "Le Prophète," with permission to produce it in this country whenever a favourable opportunity offered.

ON Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., Mr. Morley gave his Annual Concert at the Highbury Athenæum, which proved even more successful than its predecessors. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick. The other artists were Mr. John Thomas, harpist; M. Jaquinot, solo violin; and Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the pianoforte, also acting as accompanist throughout the evening. Mr. W. Morley, jun., filled the post of director, and the harmonium obbligatos were played by Mr. James Robinson.

THE London Musical Society has commenced its second season with rehearsals of Cherubini's "Requiem," in C minor. In addition to this the works proposed for performance early next year are Liszt's 13th Psalm, a new Magnificat by E. Silas, Henry Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," "Morgenlied" by Raff, and "Nœnia" by Hermann Goetz, whose Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," the Society performed for the first time in England last season. The rehearsals take place on Monday afternoons, at the South Kensington Museum, under the direction of Mr. Barnby.

ON Thursday, the 13th ult., the members of the Kyrle Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio

"Elijah," in St. Paul's Church, Old Ford. The overture was played on the new organ, and the choruses were sung with vigour and effect. The soloists were Mrs. McKackechnie, Mrs. Oram, Miss Hughes, Mr. Tietkens, and Mr. R. S. Williams. Mr. Malcolm Lawson officiated as Conductor, and Mr. Edmund H. Turpin was at the organ. The Rev. F. Haslock, in the absence of the vicar through illness, presided.

We announced some time ago that Mr. Henry Leslie would probably shortly retire from the direction of the body of vocalists he has trained to such a high state of perfection; and a rumour now reaches us that after the present season the Choir itself will cease to exist. We sincerely hope that this may not prove true; the Choir has firmly taken its place as one of the musical institutions of the country, and we should be extremely sorry to miss the excellent series of performances to which we have been for so many years accustomed.

The Victoria Choral Society, St. John's Wood, gave an entertainment on the 24th ult. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, the soprano solos being well rendered by Miss Kate Burrowes, Mr. Nosotti, Mr. Paull, Mr. Cutler, and Mr. Corbett. Miss Frances Cooper accompanied. The second part consisted of pianoforte solos and ballads, and included a Rondo Brillante (Weber), played by Miss Evans, and a solo by Miss Alice Cooper. Miss Ada Barnett accompanied the songs, and Mr. Edward Jenn was the Conductor.

Mr. Theodore Distin gave a lecture on Racine's "Athalie," at the Walworth Literary and Scientific Institution, on October 28. The solos in the work were taken by Mesdames Lavender, Davies, and Augarde, the accompaniments being played by Misses Neeld and Distin (pianoforte), and Mr. Smith (harmonium). The Narrative, instead of being given by a single reader, was recited by ladies and gentlemen, each representing a character in the drama. The performance gave much satisfaction to a large audience.

We are glad to find that the statement of accounts of the late Hereford Festival shows that the result of the meeting has been even more satisfactory than was anticipated at the time. The guarantors have not been called upon for any contribution, all expenses having been paid, and a balance carried forward to their credit. The collections at the doors after the Oratorios, together with donations since received, amount to £971 6s. 1d., which will be handed over to the Charity.

An Eastbourne paper informs us that two Orchestral Concerts will be given every Saturday throughout the winter in the Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, under the conductorship of Mr. Julian Adams. Engagements are pending with many eminent vocalists, and the excellence of these Concerts is so well known that there is little doubt they will be well attended.

A very successful Concert was given at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on the 14th ult., by Mr. W. H. Eayres. The vocalists were Miss Matilda Roby, Madame Jenny Pratt, Mr. J. H. Pearson, and Mr. Ludwig. Solos on the flute and on the pianoforte were contributed by Mr. A. Jensen and Mr. J. S. Shedlock, and the latter gentleman joined the concert-giver in a duo for piano and violin.

The Sunday Evening Oratorios at S. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, during the past month have included the "Last Judgment," "Requiem" (Mozart), "Stabat Mater," and "Lauda Sion." The band and chorus are very efficient, and large congregations continue to attend. The "Last Judgment," "Elijah," "Mount of Olives," and "Messiah" are announced for the present month.

Miss Florence Wydford gave a Ballad Concert at the Lecture Hall, Walworth Institution, on the 20th ult. Amongst the numerous artists, Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Louie Wood, and Mr. Theodore Distin deserve special mention. Miss Wydford sang "Caller Herrin," "I love my love," and "The meeting of the waters," all of which were heartily applauded.

The South Norwood Orchestral Society gave the first Concert of its second season in the Public Hall, on Tuesday, the 18th ult. The vocalists were Miss Lehmann and Mr. Bernard Lane. Mrs. Harry Brett contributed pianoforte solos, and also accompanied in an admirable manner. Mr. A. M. Hirschfeld conducted.

The Cambridge University Musical Society announces an interesting Concert for the 3rd inst. The programme will include, amongst other works, Leo's "Dixit Dominus" and Purcell's "Yorkshire Feast." Mr. C. Villiers Stanford will be the Conductor.

The Members of the South Kensington Ladies' Choir resumed their meetings on the 12th ult., under the direction of Mrs. Arthur O'Leary.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
The Sol-fa System of Teaching Singing, as used in Lancashire and Yorkshire. By James Greenwood.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This little work will, no doubt, be received by many as a novelty, and by some, perhaps, as rather a striking novelty. But all who are familiar with the history of English music will recognise in it the old English system of sol-fa, of which Christopher Simpson, who published his "Compendium" in 1667, was such an able exponent. It is not too much to say that the palmiest days of English music, as regards reading at sight, are to be traced to the general use of this system. Many, no doubt, have thought that it had entirely died out; that the movable Doh, and lastly the fixed Doh, had superseded it. This is not the case. In various parts of England hard-working musicians, chiefly trainers of choirs, had nurtured the old system, reverencing its traditions even when deprived of all text-books which could explain its principles to the rising generation. Among such quiet but able teachers, none have laboured more heartily and worked more successfully than Mr. James Greenwood, of Bristol. His pupils can read at first sight the most complicated music with ease and certainty, and he deserves therefore great credit for giving the public, in this handy little book, an opportunity of arriving at equally valuable results. He has not wasted a word on theorising or attacking hypothetical adversaries; it is purely and thoroughly a practical book, every statement of the method being accompanied by capital exercises, of graduated difficulty. Those who have ever had a lingering love for the old system will hail Mr. Greenwood as a new apostle; and those who neither know nor care about it will, if we mistake not, be considerably surprised at the results which he and other workers can produce by its means.

Christmas Eve. A short Cantata for Alto Solo, Chorus, and Orchestra. Composed by Niels W. Gade (Op. 40). The English version translated from the Poem of Aug. v. Platen, by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, M.A.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The fame of Niels Gade was rapidly growing in this country before the production of his Cantata "The Crusaders" at the Birmingham Festival; but there can be little doubt that this fine dramatic work revealed a power which even his best admirers had perhaps hardly credited him with. The short Cantata now before us (published for the first time in England) is a worthy companion to "Spring's Message" and "The Erl-King's Daughter," and will doubtless be cordially welcomed by Choral Societies in search of novelties. The alto (Seraph) solo, which runs through the Cantata, although demanding intelligence as well as voice, is by no means difficult; and the choral part is happily expressive of the text, without presenting any erudite abstrusities out of keeping with the subject. Commencing with a brief instrumental Introduction, the solo for the Seraph leads to a choral piece, with a highly characteristic accompaniment (in which the harp is appropriately prominent), the chorus of Seraphs being combined with the chorus of Shepherds with much skill and effect. A melodious solo then introduces a Chorus of Praise—excellently written, and with many points of interest—and after an Air for the Seraph, and an alto solo, the subject of which is repeated by the chorus, the Cantata concludes, dying off on a prolonged harmony of the key-note with an arpeggio accompaniment. Being published in the well-known octavo form, this Cantata cannot fail to command attention, especially as its theme is so in consonance with the approaching season.

The Silver Cloud. A Cantata for Female Voices. The words by Edward Oxenford. The music composed by Franz Abt. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The composer of the charming Cantata, "The Water Fairies," recently noticed by us, is still lingering amongst these tiny beings; but this time he has treated of the "Land Fairies," and in such a manner as to ensure a wide acceptance of his poetical little musical offering. "According to a legend," he tells us, "it is the custom in Fairyland for the fairies to assemble once a year at a certain spot for the purpose of choosing a new Queen. The choice is not entirely a free one, as a Silver Cloud descends, in the body of which is seen the counterpart of the fairy upon whom the regal honours for the forthcoming year are to devolve. The apparition is received with acclamation, and festivities are held to celebrate the accession to the throne of the fortunate Queen." The Cantata opens with a short symphony, followed by a bright Chorus in 6-8 time, the attraction of the vocal part being materially aided by an appropriately light and characteristic accompaniment. A Recitative for mezzo-soprano, succeeded by an air, in which the delights of fairy life are happily expressed both in words and music, lead to a duet for soprano and contralto in B flat, one point amongst the many beauties in which is a change into G flat major, and back to the original key, the briefness of the modulation being so well shaded off by the harmony as to give no effect of abruptness. A Choral Recitative, "Yonder where the purple foxgloves rise," is followed by a chorus, consisting of an unbroken flowing theme in 6-8 time. Another Choral Recitative, with a lovely dreamy phrase on the words, "A beauteous vision with its vapour blends," descriptive of the form seen in the "Silver Cloud," introduces a chorus with a marked theme, extremely well harmonised, and containing an effective change from double to triple rhythm, our only objection to this piece being the repetition of the same music for three verses. The soprano solo for the Fairy Queen—modestly suggesting that some other Fairy more worthy of the honour might have been chosen to fill the throne—is bold, and appropriately marked in character, the voice being throughout merely supported by the accompaniment. In the Recitative for contralto and chorus, an effective figure runs through the pianoforte part of the solo; and the few bars of chorus, announcing that the day's pleasures are over, lead to the Finale, consisting of soli for the various voices, with chorus. This last piece, although extremely short, forms an effective climax to the work, the choral "Farewell" being delivered with a lingering regret which we feel certain will be sympathetically shared by the auditors. A work like this—so poetically conceived, so delicately touched, and so refined throughout in feeling—cannot be too strongly recommended to the attention of the young. Purity in words and music are not always to be thus found united; and, when to this we add that the Cantata under notice, though simple in the extreme, evidences throughout the hand of a trained artist, there can be little doubt of its suitability not only for the drawing-room, but for practice and performance in schools where vocal music is made a feature.

Trinity College Calendar for the Academical Year 1879-1880. [George Bell and Sons.]

It is a somewhat difficult matter to review a Calendar. This bulky volume however, issued by the authorities of Trinity College, is not a dry record of the proceedings of the Institution during the Academical Year, but a history of the College itself, with the names of all the officers, a digest of the laws, a list of those who have passed the examinations with honours, and even a map of the United Kingdom, showing the branches and local centres in connection with the College. There are many interesting announcements in the Calendar of this year; but certainly one of the most important is that "the Council have made arrangements for systematic courses of lectures to be delivered partly at the College and partly at the Hospital by the two senior medical officers—Mr. Lennox Browne and Dr. Llewelyn Thomas—on the Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene of the Organs of Voice and Hearing in relation to the art of Music." The admission of purely medical evidence on these subjects as affecting musical training is comparatively modern; but there can be no question that by this method alone can we produce a race of competent teachers; and we are always glad, therefore, to welcome any step in this direction. "The complete course," we are told, "will consist of ten lectures, the lecturers year by year alternating the subject treated; thus, in the ensuing session Mr. Lennox Browne will lecture on the Organs of Voice and Speech, and Dr. Llewelyn Thomas will treat of the Aural part of the course. Practical demonstrations will be given at the Hospital on patients specially selected by the lecturers from among the 4,000 who annually attend that institution. Proficiency will be tested by a written paper, and rewarded by a silver medal (to be given by the lecturers) for the best paper, and a limited number of Certificates of Merit, to be conferred by the College on the recommendation of the lecturers." We also find that a Pianoforte Trio competition has been instituted, the prizes being ten guineas and five guineas; Adjudicator, Sir Michael Costa; the Trio which gains the prize to be publicly performed in the College at the expense of the Board, the separate part copies being supplied by the composers. All these details show that the College is in good working order; and the list of Professors employed in the Institution offers a sufficient guarantee that the Examinations are placed in competent hands. The papers set for the students (many of which are given in this volume) are certainly sufficiently difficult; but whether some of the questions contained in them are the very best for testing the musical ability of the candidates is somewhat questionable. That stupid pupils very often give correct answers to musical queries which puzzle clever ones is a fact well known to all teachers; for the process of "cramming" is one much more readily submitted to by the mere plodder than by the inborn artist. A discussion of the best means of meeting this difficulty would of course lead us far away from a review of the Trinity College Calendar; and we conclude, therefore, with a cordial congratulation on the increasing success of so young an Institution. In the Almanac contained in the volume before us, many musical events of interest are mentioned; but what means the entry, against the 1st of April, "Beethoven's Mass in D, 1824"?

Magnificat, for Four Voices and Organ (or Orchestra). Composed by E. Silas. (Op. 98.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

To remove at once a possible cause of misapprehension, we may state that this work of a conscientious and able musician deals with the Latin and not the English version of the famous hymn. It cannot, therefore, be used as an anthem in the English Church, which fact is to be regretted in view of the high level of its merit, and to be remedied at some future time by the process of adaptation. But upon the Catholic service and the concert-room the "Magnificat" has undeniable present claims, such as, we venture to say, will not be overlooked wherever they become in any measure known. Herr Silas keeps throughout in an atmosphere of dignity befitting his theme. He does not despise variety nor a certain degree of freedom, but nowhere is he found overstepping the limits that divide religious art from uncongenial elements. This juste milieu—hard to attain, and harder still to keep—is the sine quâ non of the sacred composer, who by remaining on one side of it loses charm and grace, and by passing to the other separates himself from dignity of expression and elevation of character. The work begins (Allegro non troppo, D major, 3-4) with a vigorous and simply harmonised passage, utterly free from pretence or striving of any kind, yet quite suggesting the gladness of the words. This is followed by an Andante in B flat, "Quia fecit mihi magna," consisting of a short bass solo, with a choral episode on the words "Et misericordia"; the whole marked by the studied plainness of the opening. The composer abandons this style, however, in his next section—an Allegro in the original key, "Fecit potentium." The sopranos here announce a theme for fugal treatment, the organ supplying a counterpoint of semiquavers. From first to last the movement is admirably worked. The contrapuntal treatment, often ingenious, is always free and flowing, while the ensemble passages, especially that with which the movement ends, are massive and imposing. A short choral Maestoso, "Deposuit potentes," then serves as bridge to an Andante (A major, 6-8) for tenor solo, with concerted episodes. In this the accompaniment, distinguished by much grace and beauty, occupies a conspicuous place, and if not altogether new in design, has a charm far from dissipated by familiarity. The "Gloria Patri" begins with a brief unaccompanied Adagio followed by a fugal Allegro worked out at some length. As elsewhere, Herr Silas here employs a perfectly natural and unaffected theme, developing it with much ease of style and knowledge of effect. In short the whole "Magnificat" is an example of good, sound, honest workmanship, wherein hardly a trace can be discovered of the degeneracy incident to a fidgetty, nervous and sensation-loving age.

Winter Days. Choral Glee for S.A.T.B. Poetry by J. Askham. Music by Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Cantab. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

On one or two occasions we have had to award due praise to Mr. Caldicott as a humorous composer able to find congenial inspiration in lyrics like "Humpty Dumpty," "Jack and Jill," and "Little Jack Horner." Here he appeals to us in a different capacity, having divested himself of motley and put on a very sober suit indeed. "Winter Days" is a serious poem, dealing with leafless woods, howling winds, swollen streams, frowning clouds, and regretful memories of departed flowers and extinguished sunlight. But the composer handles his theme as truthfully and with as much force as he did the nursery ballads; the consequence of which is that Choral Societies and Glee Clubs have a valuable addition to their repertory, while the work itself comes forward clothed with the recommendation of having carried off the first prize in a competition at Huddersfield. The opening Largo forms an impressive exordium well adapted to command attention for the principal movement (Allegro molto), "Black frowning clouds enshroud the sky!" This section commences fugally with a theme of much strength, and is as a whole very vigorous and expressive. We should have preferred, however, something less conventional than a chromatic ascending and descending sequence of chords of the sixth on a pedal to the words "The hollow wind goes wailing by." Imitation in music is always a low form of art, and this particular imitation has been done to death by composers little and big for a century past. The close of the Allegro, we are happy to say, makes amends by its union of strength and feeling; while the final Adagio, "The voices of the summer days" is marked by a tender sweetness at once suggestive and appropriate. The work deserves attention wherever such things are in vogue, and from it impartial judges will look to the future of the composer for that which is both higher and better.

The Parochial Psalter and Hymn-Book.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

If a new Hymn-book is necessary, we can heartily recommend this one. A quotation from the Preface may explain its purpose: "The Hymn-book now offered by the compiler to his fellow-churchmen originated in a desire frequently expressed by the clergy in his own neighbourhood for a better Hymn-book: one more select than the larger of the collections which are now popular, such as Hall and Mercer, and with greater variety than the smaller ones recently published, such as Morrell and How, and that of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

"In making this selection of Hymns, the compiler has endeavoured to keep three things especially in view:—

"1. A Scriptural tone of doctrine, as exhibited in the Book of Common Prayer.

"2. A poetic character of thought and expression, and a simple dignity of style, worthy of the time and place for which they are designed.

"3. Suitableness for Congregational use in the Public Services of the Church."

The editors of the musical portion of the work are the late Dr. Rimbault and Mr. Hopkins, whose names are a guarantee that the harmonies are suitable and vocal, and that the general selection is of a high character and in good taste. We may add that there are no less than 460 Hymns, comprising new ones by Herr F. Weber, Dr. Steggall, and the editors. Besides this, there are twenty-four Introits, and the whole of the Psalter is set to appropriate tunes.

Songs for Children. Translated from the German by S. A. W. Composed by Franz Abt.

Æsop's Fables. Versified and arranged for the Pianoforte by L. Williams. [B. Williams.]

Certainly the many children who wish to include music amongst the Christmas pleasures in store for them cannot complain that they are not well catered for. "Little Songs for Little Singers" and "Juvenile Albums" surround them on every side; and it is a hopeful sign of the times that, as a rule, all these little offerings are infinitely superior to those which formed the staple of our own juvenile concerts. The first of the volumes before us will, we think, often find its way from the nursery to the drawing-room, for all the songs contained in it are the composition of one who has already won his way to fame as a writer of vocal music. The words, melodies, and accompaniments of these artistic trifles are alike deserving of praise. Our especial favourites are: No. 1, "Sweet Spring is near;" No. 2, "Under the Tree" (a charming little song with an effective figure in the pianoforte part); No. 7, "The Mill" (a feature in which is the appropriately monotonous semiquaver accompaniment); No. 8, "Evening Song" (written for one or two voices); No. 10, "Birdie in the Cradle;" No. 13, "The Bright Waves are dancing;" and No. 16, "Laugh, Sing, Jump" (which contains a most effective change from double to triple time in each verse). All these songs are bright and cheerful, as they should be for children; and, apart from their tunefulness, will do much towards cultivating the musical taste. The second volume, "Æsop's Fables," is evidently intended for much younger children, and has but small musical pretence, most of the melodies being well known, and all being accompanied as simply as possible, with the leading fingering marked. When we say that No. 1 is set to the tune known popularly as "The Perfect Cure," some idea may be formed of the character of the pieces; but in every case the music goes excellently to the words. What these words are is, however, a matter of much importance, when fables so familiar to schoolboys and schoolgirls are thrown into verse. Some of these are exceedingly well done throughout; but there are others which form so powerful a contrast that, but for the announcement on the title-page, we should scarcely have imagined that they were written by the same person. For instance, in the "Hare and the Tortoise," we have these lines:—

> If 't was only to show off the speed that he went;
> He was such a boasting, vainglorious gent.

In "The Ox and the Frog," we are told that the Frog

> Blow'd herself out for her young ones to see.

In "The Wolf and the Crane," the pith of the fable is told in these words:—

> Your head in my mouth I could have bit off;
> Take your life as reward, and invite not my wrath.

In "The Cat and the Mice," the exigencies of rhyme force our author into the following lines:—

> He 'd not been there long when a cunning old Mouse
> Call'd out, "My good fellow, think not us to chouse."

We could multiply these instances were it necessary; but have said enough to prove that on the whole it would have been better if Mr. Williams had intrusted the versification of these Fables to another, and contented himself with merely arranging the music. Such simple stories should be simply told; but they should be told in good rhyme and in good English.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. "Day of anger, Day of mourning." Composed by Mozart.

Although it may probably be said, without fear of contradiction, that musicians of every shade of opinion would accept the "Requiem" of Mozart as an almost ideal type of true Church music, yet its splendid strains are rarely heard inside our churches and cathedrals. The reason is obvious; the use of Latin words is forbidden, and the English paraphrase does not reflect the real sentiment of the music: hence this masterpiece is neglected. We have, however, here the three fine movements, "Dies iræ," "Tuba mirum," "Rex tremendæ majestatis," arranged to the well-known translations, "Day of anger," "Wondrous sound the trumpet flingeth," and "King of Majesty tremendous." So smoothly and evenly do these words "run" to the music, that it almost ceases to be an adaptation, and must win its way into universal use as an Anthem of the noblest stamp. In this season of Advent it will be specially welcomed by organists and precentors.

English Organ Music. "Musical Standard" Series. [London: W. Reeves.]

We have had forwarded to us Numbers 8, 9, and 10 of the above series, and we commend them with much pleasure to our organist friends. No. 8 contains an "Impromptu March" by Ferris Tozer, Organist of S. David's Church, Exeter, and the first movement of a Sonata by Sir Robert Stewart. No. 9 contains the "Andante," and concluding movement of Sir Robert's Sonata. This Sonata does not aim at the high form which is generally coupled with its title; it is simply three fairly interesting movements of very moderate difficulty. An "Andante Cantabile," by the Rev. E. S. Bengough, Mus. Bac., and an "Introduction and Fugue" by Arthur Johnson occupy the remainder of the number. No 10 contains a "Brilliant March," by Alfred J. Sutton. This is a very well-written March of the florid kind, as its title indicates. No doubt it will be played as a concluding voluntary in many churches, but we hardly think it is well suited for that purpose.

The Royal Modern Tutor for the Pianoforte. Containing the Elements of Music illustrated on an entirely new plan. Composed, arranged, and fingered by Henri F. Hemy. [Metzler and Co.]

Little need be said of a work so firmly established in public favour. This new edition, carefully revised by the author, who has also added many useful details in the elementary portion, and inserted several melodies, will no doubt command an extensive sale. The desire expressed in the preface, "to keep pace with the spread and advancement of musical knowledge," is well carried out by the addition of some lessons by the most modern composers; and in every respect the Tutor will be found of the highest value in forming the taste as well as the style of the young performer.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Mozart's opera "Idomeneo, il Rè di Creta" was produced on October 25, at the Imperial Opera of Vienna as the first of a series of historical performances of the stage works by that master. The event is the more interesting since "Idomeneo," which was composed in 1780, has hitherto been all but banished from the répertoire of operatic establishments, having been, it is true, far surpassed by the later operas of the composer, which followed one another in rapid succession. In "Idomeneo" the influence of Gluck is clearly traceable, both in the careful elaboration of the recitatives and the dramatic importance attaching to the choruses. The performance in question is said to have been very successful, especial praise being bestowed upon Madame Materna, as Elektra, and Herr Labatt in the character of Idomeneo.

The Hamburg Stadt-Theater, under the active management of its director, Herr Pollini, gave on the first of last month a first representation (on any stage) of Anton Rubinstein's opera "Nero." The work, which was most carefully and elaborately mounted, was received with every mark of success, and its dramatic merits are spoken of in high terms of praise by the local press. The composer, who himself conducted the first and second performances, received a perfect ovation from an enthusiastic audience.

Madame Adelina Patti was at Berlin at the beginning of last month, where she delighted the frequenters of the Royal Opera by her impersonations of the characters of Violetta and Lucia. The Berlin Echo, alluding to the diva's visit to the Prussian capital, is indiscreet enough to publish a verbatim extract from the baptismal registry of the church of St. Louis of Madrid, relative to the lady. From this it appears (we must plead guilty to repeating the indiscretion) that the great vocalist was born at the Spanish capital on February 10, 1843, the daughter of Salvator Patti, teacher of music, and a native of Catania (Sicily), and of Catharina Chiesa, his wife, receiving the baptismal names of Adela Joanna Maria.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has resigned his position as conductor at the Opera of Hanover, where his artistic activity during the comparatively short period of his régime had been most marked. A conflict between the conductor and the leading tenor, Herr Schott, is said to have led to this decision.

The Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfurt has been deprived of the eminent services of Herr Julius Stockhausen as leading professor of the vocal department. Misunderstandings with the director, Herr Joachim Raff, are ascribed as the cause of a resolution by which the young institution and the city of Frankfurt are the chief losers.

During a Concert recently given at Berlin by Dr. Hans von Bülow, in aid of the Society of Patrons of the Bayreuth undertaking, the programme included one of the most recent compositions by Brahms, viz.: a series of eight pianoforte pieces (Capriccios and Intermezzi, Op. 76), which were much admired.

Adalbert Goldschmidt, whose Oratorio "The Seven Cardinal Sins" has attracted so much attention on the occasion of its performance at Berlin, Hanover, and Vienna, is at present engaged upon the composition of an opera entitled "Helianthus," for which he has himself written the libretto. The completion of the new work is looked forward to with much curiosity in German musical circles.

We have already referred in these columns to the brilliant success achieved by Herren H. Franke and A. Grünfeld in concerts lately given at various Austrian watering-places. The two eminent artists have since extended their tournée to Leipzig, Dresden, and other German towns, meeting everywhere with the same enthusiastic reception, the local press bestowing an equal share of high praise upon the skilful interpretations of the violinist and the improvisatorial power of the pianist.

The hundred and forty-fifth performance of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" took place on the 19th of October last, at Dresden, the work having been first brought out there just thirty-four years ago, viz., on October 19, 1845.

The monument to be erected over the grave of Robert Schumann, at Bonn, has arrived at that town from Carrara, but owing to the advanced season of the year the ceremony of inauguration will be deferred until next spring. Herr Donndorf is the sculptor of the monument, which is entirely wrought in white marble.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann is making a most successful tour in Germany, having already appeared at Berlin, Brunswick, Hamburg, &c., where she has been enthusiastically received. We propose to give a detailed account of the concerts in our next number.

The newly instituted Opéra-Populaire at Paris commenced its performances on October 20 with Halévy's "Guido et Ginevra," which was succeeded on the following day by "Lucia di Lammermoor," the two works having since then alternately furnished the répertoire of that establishment. At the National Opéra the régime has been contented with the production of familiar operatic representations, two interesting revivals being, however, in course of preparation, viz., Rossini's "Le Comte Ory," and Auber's little-known opera, "Philtre." M. Vaucorbeil, the present zealous director of the institution in question, has, it is stated, re-established a Pension-System, which had become obsolete under the régime of his predecessor, and by the operation of which the personnel of the Opéra are likely to be greatly benefited. The system consists in the establishment of a fund, partly subsidised by a Government grant, to which the members of the establishment who desire to participate in its advantages may subscribe by submitting to a reduction of five per cent. of their respective salaries, the fund being, moreover, increased by all the monetary fines, &c., imposed upon the personnel by the Administration. After the lapse of ten years members are entitled to a pension proportionate to their contributions.

M. Gounod has lately met with great triumphs at Antwerp, where his music, and especially his more recent productions, seem to have been regarded with greater favour than even in his native France. The performance of his opera, "Polyeucte," raised a storm of enthusiasm, as did a festival-concert conducted by the composer, in which a choir of 400 voices and an orchestra of 200 performers took part. The Municipal Council of Antwerp have decreed that a street shall be named after the composer.

Under the title of "Lexicon der Toonkunst," a musical dictionary, after the model of Mendel's well-known German work, is being published at Amsterdam, M. Henri Viotta being the editor.

Four young pupils of the eminent Viennese professor, Madame Marchesi, have recently obtained important engagements on operatic stages on the Continent, viz., Mdlle. Kornau at Strasburg, Mdlle. Zelar at Hamburg, Mdlle. Liszt at the Scala of Milan, and Mdlle. Nevada at Berlin.

Madame Nilsson has entered upon her engagement with the Royal Opera at Madrid, where she will appear in the operas of "Faust," "Hamlet," "Mignon," "Traviata," "Othello," and "Les Huguenots," the great vocalist having gracefully stipulated that the sum due for her first representation should be expended in aid of the sufferers by the recent inundations in Murcia. The total amount contracted for by the lady for six evenings is 90,000 francs.

Madame Albani has proceeded to Florence, the scene of her first triumphs, where she will give a series of representations at the Theatre Pagliano. Later on the eminent singer is expected to appear at Nice and Bruxelles.

The season of Italian Opera at the newly decorated Teatro Real of Madrid was recently inaugurated with a performance of Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," in which Mesdames Reszké and Scalchi, and MM. Gayarré, Verger, and Maini took a most successful part.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Kindly allow me to thank the Rev. Mr. Metcalfe for his generous—and, I may almost add, chivalric—defence of that much-abused voice, the counter-tenor. Being one of the class in question myself, I may possibly appreciate Mr. Metcalfe's arguments all the more. Like him, I contend that the substitution of contralto voices for male altos, especially in glee and anthem music, completely alters the effect produced, and not for the better. Let a quartett written for alto, two tenors, and bass, be sung by four men's voices, and the alto will have somewhat the effect of a high, brilliant tenor. Sing it again, with a female or boy in the first part, and you will find it has lost nearly all the brilliancy which characterised the first arrangement. People say there are no male altos abroad. Perhaps not; but I could name many German part-songs by Kücken, Mendelssohn, Kreutzer, and others, which are little, if at all, lower than many of our so-called "alto" parts. In the Sol-fa Reporter series I have seen two books of part-music, for "men's voices," edited by the late Alfred Stone, of Bristol, which includes many of our best "alto" glees, most of them in their original keys, such as Callcott's "Green shore of the hill of ghosts," Stevens's "Some of my heroes are low," Horsley's "By Celia's arbour," &c., &c., and I should like to ask how they are to be sung if not by counter-tenors? The editor says indeed that they are to be sung by "high tenor" voices, using their "thin register," and not by "the male contralto or counter-tenor voice," &c. (the usual amount of abuse), but it is not quite clear to me how this is to be done. A very high-voiced tenor may no doubt sing one or two extremely high notes in a song, but when he has a long string of G's and A's, followed by B or C, it will be found too heavy for him to sustain in tune, besides seriously injuring the voice. I question if even Mr. Sims Reeves himself would stand such a test. True, there are so-called "tenors" who can perform the feat, but may they not be "old friends with new names"? May not their "thin register" be suspiciously like falsetto? I have frequently met gentlemen possessed of fine alto voices which they seldom use because they were told that alto was not a man's part, and that only women should sing it. That being so, these fine natural altos wasted their voices in futile attempts to transform themselves into basses or tenors, which nature had never meant them for. Again, I have met (one or two) women with abnormally low-set voices, for whom even alto seemed too high, their best notes being actual tenor range. I see no reason why such women should not sing tenor, and high-voiced men alto, without being sneered at and denounced as unsexing themselves. I would ask any musician who has heard glees sung by such excellent altos as Mr. John Foster or Mr. Baxter, what finer singing he would desire, or could even imagine? In conclusion, let me very earnestly disclaim anything like antagonism to contraltos. So far from that, I am on the most friendly terms with many of our contraltos here, not a few of whom I highly esteem; but my idea is "there's room enough for all" in the world of music.

I remain, &c.,

D. BAPTIE.

MOZART'S SUMMER-HOUSE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It was in the spring of the year 1791 that Emanuel Schikaneder, the light-hearted director of the Theater an der Wien, came to Mozart and begged him to compose an opera for his theatre in order to animate that decaying temple of the Muses with new life.

Mozart wrote this opera in Schikaneder's plain wooden summer-house in the garden of the Starhemberg'schen Freihause auf der Wieden, in Vienna; and on September 1, 1791, a few weeks before the death of the composer, the "Magic Flute" (Zauberflöte) was produced.

After Mozart's death the little summer-house remained long neglected and unnoticed; but in the year 1816 Prince Starhemberg, well known for his love of the fine arts, caused a memorial tablet to be placed on it.

In 1874, on the rebuilding of Freihaus, Baron Sterneck, the President of the International Mozart Society, took advantage of this opportunity to beg the summer-house of Prince Camillo Starhemberg, who kindly presented it to the Society.

Baron Sterneck immediately caused the "little house" to be brought to Mozart's native place, and it now stands in a lovely nook on the Kapuzienerberg, where for some years it has been an object of deep interest to the many who visit the spot.

Possibly the summer-house was not new even at the time when the "Magic Flute" was composed in it; and now, beautifully situated as it is on the mountain-side, it is yet exposed to all the varied changes of the weather; and many of the admirers of Mozart have expressed a wish that the interesting relic may be secured by a light but suitable covering, in order to preserve it from entire decay. The cost of this would amount to several hundred pounds.

The high appreciation of Mozart's works in England encourages us to hope that our petition for a subscription for the preservation of the cradle of the "Zauberflöte" will awaken ready sympathy, and be freely responded to. May we beg you, therefore, to insert this letter in your invaluable and widely circulated paper, and also to receive for and duly remit to us all contributions that may be offered. Pray accept for your kind attention in the service of art the warmest thanks of the Committee of the International Mozartstiftung.

J. E. ENGL, Secretary.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the not very remote past, this country was looked upon as a very dubious field for managers of opera troupes and concert companies to venture upon, unless indeed some phenomenal attraction, backed up by extraordinary modes of advertising, such as was experienced in the Jenny Lind times under the management of the great showman Barnum, and at a more recent period when that truly great artist, Christine Nilsson, made her appearance as one of a fine galaxy of artists under the management of the Messrs. Strakosch. Those days are happily past, though great artists are still sought after here as in other great musical centres; and your Manager Mapleson, through his disappointments this season, being deprived for many weeks in New York of the services of his great prima donna, Madame Gerster, has every reason to acknowledge the fact, however otherwise efficiently his company may be constituted.

Musical culture and appreciation has been very rapid in this country during the past fifteen or twenty years.

Within the shorter space of time here named the writer, who for many years was actively engaged as an officer of an old Handel and Haydn Society, was often told—and by those who were thoroughly interested in the advancement of music among our naturally cold-blooded and eminently practical New England population—that he was labouring to no purpose, as "Oratorio could never be popular among us; that nowhere but in England could it ever be made sufficiently attractive to remunerate those who were devoting their time and energies to that object."

I can only say these were false prophets. To-day Oratorio is one of the most popular forms of musical entertainment; and where the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston was the only Society of note in this country twenty or possibly twenty-five years ago, we now count a good Choral Society engaged in Oratorio work in very many of our large cities and towns near Boston, besides the larger organisations in nearly every great city of this country, even to the Pacific coast. The "Pinafore" craze, as it may justly be called, has also done its good work by introducing numerous deacons and divines, as well as their sisters and cousins and aunts, to the inside of a theatre, where many had never ventured before; and Messrs. Sullivan and Gilbert, who are now here, will undoubtedly add fuel to the flame in the introduction to our amusement seekers of their new work, whatever it is.

We are just now overburdened with a stock of Professors and Mus. Doc.'s, but charlatanry usually cures itself in the course of time; and all true lovers of the high and noble in musical culture, may look with confidence to the future of our country in this as in all kindred arts. We are a progressive people, and never retrograde in our movements.

BACH'S COMIC CANTATAS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

DEAR SIR,—I feel greatly obliged for the generous terms in which the production of Bach's Comic Cantatas are spoken of in the last number of "THE MUSICAL TIMES"; but permit me to put in a disclaimer on one point with which the writer has unintentionally credited me. Although I did a large amount of "musical editing" in preparing the works for a first performance in this country, my task did not embrace any translation. The rendering of the words of the "Coffee" Cantata into English was done for me by an old and valued friend a good many years ago, and I trust this explanation and acknowledgment may come under his notice.

It was extremely gratifying to find so ready and cordial an acceptance extended to the Cantatas by the leading musical and other journals, and by so many eminent musicians who did me the honour of being present at the performance.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

Newark, November 22, 1879. SAMUEL REAY.

IN answer to Mr. John W. Lawrance, who in our October number says that Beethoven's Mass in D was last performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society on March 25, 1870, a correspondent writes to remind us that it was given for the second time at the "Oratorio Concerts," under the direction of Mr. Barnby, on May 5, 1871.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Alford, Lincolnshire.—On October 31, an Amateur Concert, conducted by Mr. Henry Brown (Organist of the Parish Church), with recitations by the Rev. W. W. Talfourd and Miss Talfourd, was given in the Corn Exchange. The part-songs, &c., were well sung by the church choir, assisted by Miss Rose Maddison, Miss Talfourd, and Mr. Starmer.

Belfast.—The opening Subscription Concert of the Belfast Choir took place in the Ulster Hall on Wednesday, October 29. Mr. H. Stiehl's Evening Hymn, the words by Mr. T. Smith, served to show to what careful training the members of the chorus had been subjected, and in Mendelssohn's psalm, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" the correctness of the chorus, particularly as regards time, was observable. The solo vocalists were Miss Wells, and Messrs. Baxter, Coates, Carter, and Winn. The programme included a number of well-known glees, which were excellently rendered. Mr. F. C. Smythe conducted.——A very successful Organ Recital was given in the Carlisle Memorial Church on Thursday evening, October 30, by Mr. W. F. W. Jackson, Mus. Bac., Oxon, Organist of Holywood Parish Church. An excellent programme, selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Bach, Handel, and H. Smart, gave great satisfaction to a large audience.

Birmingham.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company concluded a very successful visit on Saturday, the 1st ult. In addition to the operas usually given, Guiraud's Piccolino, and Ambroise Thomas's Mignon, were produced for the first time in Birmingham, the latter being so successful as to be performed four times. Miss Georgina Burns has much improved since her last visit, and Miss Julia Gaylord and Mr. Joseph Maas contributed greatly to the success of the operas.——Performances of English Ballad Opera were given at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on the 3rd, 5th, and 7th ult. by Mr. Pyatt's Company. Mr. Sims Reeves was to have sung, but although he duly arrived, he was suffering so much from hoarseness that he could not appear. The performances were of considerable merit.——Mr. Stockley opened his seventh series of Orchestral Concerts on Thursday, the 6th ult. In place of a symphony, the instrumental music to the Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn) was given, and the programme comprised the overtures, Men of Prometheus (Beethoven), Parisina (Sterndale Bennett), Hamlet (Gade), (first time in Birmingham), and some lighter pieces, including the Gavotte, "Madame de Pompadour," by H. Weist Hill, and solos for violoncello and cornet. All were admirably given. The vocalists were Miss Helen D'Alton and Mr. Redfern Hollins, who were warmly applauded after their respective performances. Messrs. C. W. Perkins and R. M. Winn officiated ably as accompanists, and Mr. Stockley conducted.——The Committee recently appointed at a public meeting to carry out the project of establishing People's Concerts has adopted the title of the Birmingham Musical Association, and the first Concert took place in the Town Hall on Saturday evening, the 8th ult. About 130 of the members of the Festival Choral Society gave their services gratuitously, and the committee engaged Mr. H. R. Piercy and Miss Ambler as soloists, Mr. Stimpson as organist, and Mr. R. Winn as pianist. The prices of admission were fixed at sixpence for the side-galleries and threepence for the rest of the hall, and the doors were opened an hour previous to the performance. No money was taken at the doors, but tickets were to be obtained at a temporary office in the road outside. It was not long before the hall was well filled, and some time before the commencement of the performance it was crowded in all parts. As there was considerable crushing at the booking office, the Mayor obtained a supply of tickets and stood selling them on the footpath for upwards of twenty minutes. A large number of people were unable to obtain admission. At half-past seven the appearance of the Conductor (Mr. Stockley) and of Mr. Stimpson was the signal for hearty outbursts of applause. The warmest greeting, however, was reserved for the Mayor, the audience standing and cheering him with enthusiastic goodwill as he took his seat in the front of the great gallery. There was, perhaps, a larger attendance of the artisan classes than at the Mayor's free concerts. Here and there were persons belonging to the middle class, but throughout the hall the great bulk was composed of working men and their families. The first part of the programme, consisting of selections from the Messiah and the Creation, was introduced by an Organ Offertoire, by Lefébure-Wely. In the interval between the parts the Mayor appeared upon the orchestra, and spoke a few words with regard to the work of the Birmingham Musical Association. The present concert, he said, was the first of a series which it was hoped would extend through the whole season. It was intended that the concerts should consist of the best music, such as the choruses which were given at the Musical Festivals, so that they would afford to all the opportunity of enjoying that which hitherto a certain class had so highly appreciated. The various musical Societies had come forward in a most generous manner to lend their assistance, and had thereby shown that love of their art was the motive that prompted their proceedings. That night they had the pleasure of hearing the Festival Choral Society; next Saturday the Amateur Harmonic Association had consented to give their services, and they would be followed by the Philharmonic and other Societies in their turn. The Association hoped, as time went on, to extend the concerts to most of the Board Schools and other places where suitable accommodation could be found, so that every night there might be places where high-class music could be heard. He congratulated the committee and Mr. Marshall, the honorary secretary, for the energy they had shown in the commencement of their work, and he was much gratified that on the last occasion on which he should appear in public as Mayor of Birmingham he should be surrounded by so many happy faces in connection with one of the purest and best movements which could be inaugurated for the amusement and elevation of the people. The second part of the concert, comprising a selection of secular music, was then proceeded with.——The tenth Annual Festival of the Birmingham Schools Choral Union was held at the Town Hall on the 10th ult., with a choir of nearly 1,000 voices; Mr. J. Stimpson as solo and accompanying organist, Mr. D. F. Davis as solo harpist, and Mr. G. J. Rankilor as Conductor. There was a large audience, and the performances gave great satisfaction. The Schools Choral Union was organised about fourteen years ago by some of the head teachers of the district church schools, the primary object being the cultivation of a pure taste for music amongst the young. The programme included anthems, glees, part-songs, organ and harp solos. One of the anthems was Mr. A. Gaul's setting of the Twenty-third Psalm, written expressly for this Festival.——Mr. S. S. Stratton gave a lecture on "Music and its Power for Good," on Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., in the lecture-room of the Church of the Saviour, the choir rendering the illustrations, which comprised selections from Mendelssohn, Spohr, Rossini, &c. Mr. Henry Leslie's part-song, "How sweet the moonlight sleeps," was given with great delicacy and effect.——On Thursday, the 20th ult., the Festival Choral Society commenced its season with Mendelssohn's Elijah; Miss Mary Davies, Miss Helen D'Alton (in place of Madame Patey, indisposed), Mr. Joseph Maas, and Herr Henschel being the principal vocalists. The performance was a remarkably fine one, and the attendance enormous.

Bolton.—On the 19th ult. a Concert was given in the Temperance Hall. The vocalists were Mrs. Dawson, Miss Baines, Miss Royce, Miss Dickinson, Miss Mercer, Miss Holland, Mr. Jordan, Mr. Gillett, Mr. Heywood, Mr. Farnworth, and a choir of over forty voices. Mr. J. A. Hartley played Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, Nos. 2 and 3, and with Miss E. Davis, Schubert's Marche Militaire in D. The other portion of the programme consisted of glees, part-songs, &c. Mr. R. Moore conducted, and Mr. J. A. Hartley accompanied.

Brighton.—On the afternoon of Wednesday, the 5th ult., Mr. Kuhe gave his third and last Pianoforte Recital.——At the second of Mr. George Watts's fifth series of Philharmonic Concerts, given in the Dome Assembly Room on the 7th ult., the attendance was so large that many had to be turned away from the doors. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Attwood, Miss Giulia Welmi (who created a marked effect by her excellent singing throughout the evening), Madame Trebelli, Miss Julia Elton, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick; M. E. De Paris (pianoforte), and Signor Guerini (violin). The programme was varied and highly interesting; and Mr. Watts is to be congratulated upon the brilliant success of the concert. The duties of Conductor were shared by Mr. Lindsay Sloper and Mr. F. Kingsbury, Mr. Robey presiding at the organ.——On the 17th ult., Mr. Kuhe gave his third Subscription Concert. The vocalists were Madame Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Minnie Hauk, and Madame Marie Roze, Signor Brignoli, Signor Pinto, and Mr. Carleton. Mr. Kuhe (piano), Signor Guerini (violin), Mdlle. Kitty Berger (zither), and Herr Engel (harmonium).——The artists at the Saturday Afternoon Concerts at the Aquarium have included Mesdames Patey, Edith Wynne, and Mary Cummings; Signor Guerini and Mr. Carrodus (violin).

Bristol.—On Monday, the 3rd ult., another of Mr. Riseley's Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, when the band was, as usual, the principal attraction. The programme included Beethoven's Grand Symphony, No. 2, in D, the Overtures Die Zauberflöte (Mozart) and Die Felsenmuhle (Reissiger), A. Wallerstein's "Triumph March," and Mr. J. L. Roeckel's Sarabande and Gavotte from Olivia, the latter being conducted by the composer. Mr. F. W. W. Bampfylde, A.R.A.M., played Hiller's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in F sharp minor, in a most artistic manner. The vocalists were Miss Marian McKenzie and Mr. E. T. Morgan.——On Monday, the 17th ult., another Concert of the same series was given, and was equally well attended. The various items in the programme included Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, Op. 55, very creditably played; the Overtures La Cenerentola (Rossini) and Rosamunde (Schubert), E. Prout's Minuet and Trio, and Wagner's Grand March from Tannhäuser. Mr. W. L. Barrett played Glinka's piccolo solo Pas de Patineurs, and the vocalist was Miss Amy Aylward, R.A.M. Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.

Clifton.—On Wednesday, the 5th ult., Mr. J. L. Roeckel gave a private Pianoforte Recital in the Victoria Rooms in aid of the funds of the Bristol Benevolent Institution. The programme included Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith;" Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor, No. 3; Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 29), No. 3; and selections from Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, and Hummel, all of which were played with great taste and expression. The whole amount of the receipts, after deducting for expenses, was handed over to the funds of the institution by Mr. Roeckel.——On Wednesday, the 12th ult., the first of the series of Classical Chamber Concerts was given in the Victoria Rooms. The performers were Mr. Henry Holmes (first violin), Mr. Valentine Nicholson (second violin), Mr. Alfred Burnett (viola), and Signor Alessandro Pezze (violoncello). Unfortunately at the last moment Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy was prevented by indisposition from taking her usual place at the pianoforte, thus necessitating an alteration in the programme. Excerpts from the works of Mozart, Beethoven, and Haydn were splendidly played by the instrumentalists, and listened to with the deepest attention. For the first time at these Concerts a vocalist was engaged—Signor Monticco—whose performance was much appreciated.

COVENTRY.—On Tuesday the 4th ult. the Coventry Musical Society gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass in C, and Spohr's Last Judgment, in the Corn Exchange. The band and chorus numbered 150. Mr. Trickett, F.C.O., conducted, and was well supported by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The choruses in both works were well sung, and the band was very efficient.

DARWELL, NEAR BLACKBURN.—On Thursday evening, the 6th ult., Mr. T. S. Hayward gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Exhibition. A well-selected programme was interpreted in a most excellent manner, and highly appreciated by a large audience.

DONCASTER.—On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., Dr. Spark, of Leeds, gave a lecture in the Corn Exchange on "Anthems and Anthem Writers," the Vicar of Doncaster presiding. The lecturer traced the history of the anthem from the earliest known examples down to the present period. The illustrations, which were most charmingly rendered by St. George's choir, Leeds, comprised specimens from Farrant, Weldon, Purcell, Greene, Bennett, Goss, Wesley, Smart, and Spark. The position of the anthem and its importance in the services of the Church were clearly pointed out, and many interesting circumstances connected with the lives and works of the composers were narrated. A deep interest was evinced in the lecture by the audience, and at its conclusion the Vicar moved a vote of thanks to Dr. Spark.

DUDLEY.—A performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson was given by the Vocal Union on the 11th ult, in the Public Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Miner, Miss E. Bailey, Mr. J. Carless, Mr. W. Grayson, and Mr. O. Millward. The performance gave great satisfaction to a numerous audience, the especial feature throughout being the remarkable clearness and precision of the chorus-singing. Mr. James Hale was an efficient leader of the band, which particularly distinguished itself in the Overture and the "Dead March." Mr. B. Barlow conducted.

DUNDEE.—On the 13th ult. the Amateur Vocal Union gave the first Concert of the present season, when Gadsby's Cantata The Lord of the Isles was performed with great success for the first time in Scotland. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams (Edith), Madame Enriquez (Isabel), Mr. Vernon Rigby (Ronald), and Mr. Thurley Beale (Robert Bruce). The choruses were effectively rendered, under the able direction of Mr. Kinross. It is proposed to repeat the work next season, with orchestral accompaniments.

EDINBURGH.—At the consecration of St. Mary's Cathedral, by the Bishop of Edinburgh, there was full choral service. Mr. T. H. Collinson, Mus. Bac., Organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ. The choir of the Cathedral was largely supplemented by choristers from the Cathedrals of York Durham, and Ripon, and several local choirs. The Anthem selected as specially suitable for the occasion was by Dr. Boyce, the solos being efficiently rendered by Messrs. Marr, Lewis, Banks, Luck, Sanderson, and Purves. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Peterborough.

FARNHAM.—On Thursday, the 20th ult., a highly successful Concert was given in the Corn Exchange by Mr. Lewis Tily, assisted by Miss Rose Barnby, R.A.M., Madame San Martino-Campobello, Mr. Sidney Barnby, Mr. Henry Parkin, Mr. Lovett King, Mr. Prenton, and Herr Carl Schneider. The programme was miscellaneous, and the most successful pieces were "Robert, toi que j'aime" (Miss Rose Barnby), "The Lost Chord" (Madame Campobello), "Stranded" (Mr. Prenton), "Ella" (Mr. H. Parkin), and the violin soli played by Herr Schneider. Several glees and part-songs were effectively sung during the evening by the British Glee Union (Messrs. Barnby, Parkin, L. King, and Prenton). Mr. Lovett King presided at the piano, and, in addition to accompanying the vocal music, contributed two or three buffo sketches.

GLOSSOP.—The first Concert of the season was given in the Town Hall, on Tuesday night, October 28, by the members of the Philharmonic Society, when Handel's Oratorio, Joshua, was performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Arthur, Miss Bowmont, Mr. Binns, and Mr. Rickard. Violoncello, Mr. Allan Avison; trumpet, Mr. John Harrison; leader, Mr. G. Jackson; and Mr. Charles Hall officiated as Conductor in the absence of Mr. Thornhill. The Oratorio was well rendered, and the Concert, musically, very successful.

HALIFAX.—An appropriate conclusion to the reopening services of the noble Parish Church was the first Choral Festival given therein by the various choirs forming the Choral Union in connection with this Deanery. The Union was started last summer, and the festival held on Saturday evening, October 25, proved beyond a doubt the success of its operations since that time. For some months the members have been carefully preparing, under the guidance of Dr. Roberts, for this event, and his efforts have met with most signal success. The chancel was completely filled, and the effect of so large a number of trained voices was extremely beautiful. Dr. Roberts presided at the organ. Sir John Goss's Evening Service in C, and Sir F. Ouseley's Anthem, "It came even to pass," were sung. The hymn before the sermon was "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven," to the music of Sir John Goss; and during the collection "Hark, the sound of holy voices" was sung to James Langran's well-known setting. Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus formed a noble finish to a magnificent service.—— An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on Monday, October 27, by the Rev. Sir F. Ouseley and Dr. Roberts. The instrument ranks as one of the finest in the kingdom, and is an attractive feature in the restored church. The programme was a very comprehensive one, and each piece, played as it was with perfect taste, was listened to with the greatest attention by a large and appreciative audience.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—The first of a series of Six Subscription Concerts was given by Mr. J. R. Adamson and Mr. Aldous in the School-room of the Church of the Ascension, on the 11th ult. The programme included two movements, Adagio and Finale, from Haydn's Twenty-first Quartett; Allegro and Andante from Mozart's Eighth Sonata, for violin and piano; Rondo d'Elizabetta, by Rossini, for flute, violin, and piano; the Valse from Faust, arranged by Jaëll, for piano; and one or two lighter pieces. Two readings were given by Miss Crawford, a lady of marked ability.

HERTFORD.—A handsome Organ, of two manuals and pedal organ, built for the new chapel of Haileybury College, by Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons, was opened on the 16th ult. by Mr. P. H. Diemer, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, Bedford. The preacher was the Dean of Peterborough, and the Anthem, "It is a good thing to give thanks," was composed expressly for the occasion by Mr. Diemer.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The first Concert of the Glee and Madrigal Society took place on the 21st ult. A varied programme was presented, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. J. Varley, and Mr. W. Eastwood being the soloists. The new Prize Glee, "Winter Days," by A. J. Caldicott, and the same composer's humorous Glee, "Humpty Dumpty," were very well rendered, and elicited much applause, as did also T. Distin's Prize Glee, "Jack Horner."

KIDDERMINSTER.—An Organ Recital was given on the 6th ult. on the new Organ just erected by Messrs. Morten and Taylor, of London, in the Unitarian Chapel. The Organ, though small, is an effective one of two manuals. Mr. G. C. Blunden, Organist of St. Mark's, Lewisham, who was specially engaged, played an attractive programme in a masterly manner.

LEAMINGTON.—The new three-manual Organ, built by Hill and Son for the Parish Church, was opened by Sir H. Oakeley on the Eve of All Saints. Special services were held, and Recitals given by Sir H. Oakeley, Sir. F. Ouseley, and Mr. Frank Spinney. In connection with the opening a performance of the Messiah was given in the church, with the Misses Robertson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Santley as solo vocalists. The band was complete, and the chorus numbered about 200 voices. Mr. Frank Spinney was Conductor, and the performance was an entire success.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—Mr. T. J. Price's Concert took place on the 11th ult., the artists being Miss Elène Webster, Miss Louie Heard, Miss Annie Lewer, and Mr. Stedman (vocalists), and Miss Agnes Cardus (violin). All were very successful in their rendering of the various pieces allotted to them. The concert-giver played a new Caprice for pianoforte of his own composition, and also gave two humorous songs, which were much appreciated.

MANCHESTER.—The Athenæum Musical Society commenced its thirteenth season by a Concert on the 3rd ult. The selection was miscellaneous and entirely vocal, including the Prize Glees, "Hushed in death" (H. Hiles), "Hence, loathed melancholy" (Hy. Lahee), and several well known part-songs. The whole of the numbers were admirably rendered, and the performance fully sustained the high reputation which this Society possesses for its excellent part-singing. The programme included some songs, duets, &c., by members of the Society. As usual, Dr. Hiles conducted. At the next Concert Handel's Alexander's Feast will be performed, with orchestral accompaniments.

MARSH CHAPEL, GRIMSBY.—On Tuesday, October 28, the Rev. T. R. Matthews, a well-known hymn-writer and editor of the Village Organist, opened a chancel Organ of considerable power and merit in the parish church of Marsh Chapel. The builder, Mr. J. R. Consans, of Monk's Road, Lincoln, has so arranged the ten stops as to avoid the old two-manual design, still retaining the efficiency hitherto supposed to be attainable only by following out that plan, the open diapason being made to answer for a solo on the great organ, or as an additional bass solo for the pedal, with Lieblich-gedackt both for treble and bass; thus not only simplifying arrangements, but considerably reducing the cost, at the same time leaving the Organ ready for further development.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—On the 24th ult. a Concert of sacred music was given in Salem Church, in aid of the Organ Fund. Dr. Stainer's Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, formed the first part, and was successfully rendered by the choir. The solos were sung by Miss Foggin, Mr. Farquharson, and Mr. Winyard. The second part of the programme was a selection from Handel's works. Mr. Foggin presided at the Organ.

NEWCASTLE, STAFFORDSHIRE.—The harvest thanksgiving services were continued at St. Giles's Church on Sunday, the 16th ult. The choir, under the direction of Mr. J. Bourne, sang with much efficiency the Anthems, "I will magnify Thee," and "Fear not, O land" (both by Sir John Goss). The offertories were to defray the debt on the Organ, a fine instrument, which is a great acquisition to the services of the church. The organist, Mr. J. Preece, ably displayed the qualities of the instrument. The special organ performances were: Air, with variations, from the Grand Symphony in D (Haydn); grand Postlude in E flat (Batiste), O sanctissima (F. Lux), and Grand March in B flat (E. Silas). The offertories in the aggregate realised £40 18s.

NORTH SHIELDS.—On Tuesday, October 28, the Tynemouth Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Francis Lloyd, Mus. Bac., Oxon., gave a most successful performance of the Messiah for their first Concert of the season. The chorus numbered over 200 voices. The soloists were Miss Tomlinson, of Leeds, Miss Robertina Hall, of Newcastle, and Messrs. Whitehead and Nutton, of Durham Cathedral. Mr. William Wilson presided at the Organ, and Mr. George F. Vincent (of Leipzig Conservatoire) at the piano. The Tynemouth Philharmonic Society has only been in existence a few months, therefore the members are to be congratulated on the success of their first Concert.

OCKLEY, SURREY.—The annual Harvest Services were held on Sunday, the 2nd ult., with choral celebration, in S. Margaret's Church. Sadler's Kyries, Sursum Corda, and Glorias, with the other portion of the service by Dykes, were sung with true devotional feeling. Matins, at 11 a.m., began with the Processional "Onward, Christian soldiers"; Tallis's responses; the psalms, Gregorian, according to Helmore; Te Deum, Sadler in F; Anthem, Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works"; and appropriate Hymns (Ancient and Modern), sung with great spirit by the choir, which was assisted by two leading boys from St. Paul's, Brighton, Masters W. Snelling and Herbert Sadler. Evensong was sung in S. Margaret's at 3.30 and in S. John's at 7.30 p.m., when the Processional was "Brightly gleams our banner"; the Magnificat to the first Parisian tone, sung in unison, with varied organ accompaniment, and the Nunc dimittis to the second Parisian tone. Mr. Charles G. Sadler played during the day Smart's March in G; Batiste's Offertoire in D; "Marche aux Flambeaux" and the "Hallelujah" Chorus.

OXFORD.—The Choral Society gave a performance in the Corn Exchange, on Thursday evening, the 6th ult., of Stainer's sacred Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, and Spohr's Oratorio, The Last Judgment. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Antelli, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, and Mr. Bridson. Dr. Stainer's work contains many striking passages, and the whole spirit of the theme is admirably conveyed. Among its special features may be mentioned the first tenor solo, "My hope is in the everlasting," which was finely given by Mr. M'Guckin; the chorus of women, "Sweet tender flower;" the chorus, "Awake, thou that sleepest;" the duet, "Love divine," well rendered by Mrs. Osgood and Mr. M'Guckin; and the jubilant trio and chorus, "To Him who left," which is a powerful finale. The work was exceedingly well rendered throughout. Spohr's Last Judgment was performed with marked success. Special mention may be made of the duet, "Forsake me not," by Mrs. Osgood and Mr. M'Guckin, and the quartett and chorus, "Blest are the departed." Mr. Bridson and Miss Antelli also rendered essential service, and sang with care and conscientiousness. Mr. W. H. Allchin, Mus. Bac., conducted with his usual ability, both band and chorus giving ample evidence of his skilful training.

PENDLETON.—The Choral Union gave the first Concert of the eighth season at the Town Hall, on the 17th ult. The programme comprised several glees, choruses, and songs, and two pianoforte solos, all of which were well executed, and elicited much applause. Miss Prestwich and Miss Walwyn were the vocalists, and Mr. De Jong gave two flute solos. The pianoforte solos were well executed by Mr James Lowe, who also acted as Conductor for the first time since his appointment to that office. At the second Concert, on the 15th inst., the Messiah will be given, with augmented band and chorus.

RENFREW.—The Choir of Anderston Parish Church, Glasgow, gave a very interesting Concert at the Burgh Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Josh. Ives. The programme was well selected and capitally executed, the Scotch humorous part-songs arranged by Mr. Ives being rendered with good effect and eliciting hearty applause. Among the soloists were the Misses Hannah and Walker, and Messrs. Craig, Watt, and Hamilton. Mr. Ives and Miss Gimmell played two pianoforte duets, which were well received.

WALLINGTON.—The first of a series of Classical Chamber Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Green, took place at that gentleman's residence, "Sterndale," on Monday evening, the 10th ult. The building in which these concerts take place was especially erected for the purpose, and is therefore absolutely perfect in every detail for the due appreciation and rendition of classical chamber music. The concert commenced with Mozart's Quartett No. 2, in D minor, arranged for two violins, viola, and violoncello, admirably played by Messrs. Asperne Deane, W. H. Hill, Edward Deane, and Albert. Mr. W. H. Cummings made his first public appearance in Wallington on this occasion, and his singing of the Recitative and Air, "Deeper, and deeper still," and "Waft her angels," and Beethoven's "Adelaida," will not soon be forgotten. As a solo for clarionet, Mr. Leonard Beddome played "Ballade" (Niels W. Gade). Messrs. Edward Deane and Turle Lee played a Notturno for viola and pianoforte by Beethoven, and the latter gentleman accompanied the vocal items.

WALTON-ON-THE-HILL.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in the church of St. John the Evangelist, on October 29, when an appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas Dickson. The musical portion of the service, which was rendered by the voluntary surpliced choir of the church, was fully choral, and included Wesley's Service in F, and Greene's Anthem, "Thou visitest the earth," the solo being carefully sung by Master Grundy. Mr. Carmichael presided at the organ.

WARRINGTON.—Mr. T. M. Pattison gave the first of a series of Concerts on Monday evening, the 3rd ult. Solos on the harp by Mr. John Thomas were features in the programme, and Miss Amy Empsall, who took the solo parts in several glees, also sang several songs very successfully. Mr. Pattison's band and choir acquitted themselves in a manner which must have been most satisfactory to their Conductor.

WEEKLEY, NORTHANTS.—On Thursday, the 20th ult., the new Organ, erected in Weekley Church by Messrs. Wordsworth and Maskell, Leeds, was opened by Mr. C. Stanley Wise, Organist of Godalming Parish Church. The instrument, consisting of two manuals and pedal organ, is very effective. After service Mr. Wise gave a Recital, including Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, the St. Ann's Fugue, and a selection from the works of Hesse, Batiste, Merkel, &c.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—The Wellingborough Philharmonic Society gave its twelfth Concert at the Corn Exchange, on Monday evening, October 27. The Oratorio selected was Haydn's Creation, which was very successfully rendered. The artists were Mrs. M. A. Warren (of Manchester), Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Hilton. Conductor, W. R. Harrington, Esq.

WEYBRIDGE.—Mr. H. P. G. Brooke, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of St. James's Church, gave his eighth annual benefit Ballad Concert at the Institute on Tuesday, the 4th ult. The programme was well selected, and Mr. Brooke, who conducted and accompanied with his usual talent, was ably assisted by Mr. Walter Fitton, R.A.M., who played two pianoforte solos in brilliant style. Most of the vocalists, who were well-known amateurs, displayed considerable expression and artistic skill. The Concert was highly successful.

WOODFORD.—A Musical Entertainment was given on the 19th ult., at the Assembly Rooms, in aid of the Woodford Institute. The entire arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Charles Parker; the artists being Miss Nellie Dakin, Miss Laura Dakin, Messrs. Munday, Arthur Weston, H. J. Dakin, C. Parker, Baylis Henry, and Turner.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark's opening Concert of the sixth season was given in the Music Hall on the 4th ult. The programme, if not abounding in variety, was of an excellence which was highly appreciated. The instrumentalists were Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé, and the vocalists Mr. J. Hervet D'Egville, a younger son of the late Mr. James D'Egville, of this city, who possesses a fine bass voice, and Miss Percy. Altogether the concert was a most enjoyable one and highly successful. Mr. Garton ably accompanied the vocal music.——The first Concert of the Philharmonic Society for the present season was given at the Music Hall on the 21st ult. before a large and highly appreciative audience. The programme comprised Beethoven's Engedi (Mount of Olives), a selection from Handel's Israel in Egypt, and the Overture to Esther. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott (who created a marked effect by her excellent singing as the Prophetess in Beethoven's work), Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Millward. The choruses in Israel in Egypt were finely given, and reflected the utmost credit upon the admirable training of Mr. Done, who conducted.

YORK.—A performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus was given in the Festival Concert-rooms on the 12th ult. by the York Musical Society, before a brilliant audience. The principal artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Riley, Mr. Hollins, and Mr. McCall (of the Minster choir). The chorus was augmented by several members of the Cathedral choirs of York and Leeds, and the orchestra was strengthened by the best instrumentalists from Leeds and neighbourhood. Mr. R. S. Burton conducted with his usual tact and ability.——In connection with the Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition, several Recitals on the Great Organ have been given during the past month by Mr. Loaring, F.C.O., of Bradford. On each occasion his programmes were exceedingly interesting, and the performances met with very general approbation.

LINDSAY SLOPER.

In Twenty Books, each 6s.; or, in 3 volumes, each, net £1.

In bringing this important work before the notice of the musical public, ASHDOWN and PARRY beg to call particular attention to the following extract from Mr. Lindsay Sloper's Preface:—

"It is obvious that the purpose indicated in the preface to the original edition of these Studies—i.e., the cultivation of expression and rhythmical feeling—being paramount in M. Stephen Heller's mind, and the technical difficulty of each Study of secondary consideration, there might occur in one book studies which, while making no greater demand on the musical sentiment of the pupil than others, would present much greater mechanical obstacles to overcome. A progressive arrangement of these Studies, fusing the various books together, was considered desirable by M. Heller's publishers, and I have in the present publication attempted the task. The idea had previously occurred to a musician of repute in Vienna, Herr Hans Schmitt (to whom one of the numbers is specially and quaintly inscribed); but he did not venture beyond making a table of the various studies, in the order he would recommend them for practice. This plan was necessarily incomplete, since, to make a perfectly graduated study of them, it was necessary to be at once possessed of the entire work, consisting of twenty books. Now that they are published in the order I have considered desirable, a single Book may be purchased, with the security that each Study therein contained is of about equal mechanical difficulty with the rest; at the same time, the complete work is issued in volumes that the development of executive facility required may be viewed as a whole. To any objections that I have not always successfully classified the numbers in the strict ratio of their difficulty, I would submit that some of the apparently easy Studies require a considerable amount of musical feeling and intelligence. For instance, Nos. 14 and 15 are mechanically easier than No. 1, but surely demand from the player, the former more fancy, and the latter more emotional playing than can be expected from a juvenile student, who might correctly and appropriately render No. 1. An intimacy, extending over the whole of my professional life, with M. Heller's works, each year bringing with it stronger conviction of their individuality and proof of their constant freshness, and the personal relations with their author that I have during the same period been permitted to enjoy, are at least qualifications I may, without presumption, claim for the duty that has been confided to me."

From the Musical Standard, October 11.

To praise the pleasant, genial, refined writings of Stephen Heller is to 'gild refined gold.' He has won his way in all quarters by the earnest purpose, the genial warmth, and the refined form of his compositions. These Studies are not, like Czerny's 'Fingerfertigkeit' or his 'Etude de Vélocité,' written to develop muscular power or mere rapidity of execution, nor are they, like the shoals of 'tutors' with which the market is flooded, silly selections of 'airs' which never instruct anybody how to do anything. Heller had a higher purpose; he wished to teach the student of the pianoforte to love music, and to be a musician first and a virtuoso afterwards. These Studies are not, as a rule, difficult to play, and their great superiority consists in the fact that while they develope technique, they develope also that soul of which technique is but the bodily frame. There are in all one hundred and seventy-seven Studies, and all are carefully and judiciously fingered. Messrs. Ashdown and Parry have given to the musical world a beautiful edition, ably edited and clearly printed, of some of the most refined and beautiful music to be found in the entire literature of the pianoforte."

PREFACE.

"ACIS AND GALATEA" appears to have been composed for the Duke of Chandos about the year 1720, and was performed at Cannons in the year following.

As in many of Handel's works which were written about this period, the disposition of the chorus parts is such as to warrant the supposition that the choir he had to deal with was limited in its numbers (there being apparently no Altos), and exceptional in the compass of its Tenor voices. This conjecture is borne out by the fact that the omission of an Alto part, and the division of the Tenor into two or three parts, is common to nearly all the works which Handel wrote for the Duke of Chandos, but is found in scarcely any, if any, of his subsequent compositions.

It would be difficult otherwise to account for so unusual an arrangement, although it might have been supposed that when his connection with the choir at Cannons ceased, he would have rearranged the vocal parts and brought them more into conformity with the requirements of ordinary choirs. But it would seem that when his attention became absorbed in the production of his Oratorios, he laid aside the smaller works of the "Chandos" period, only taking them up to transfer a movement which might be required for the larger composition then in hand. This, however, would not account for a work of the importance of "Acis and Galatea" being left in its exceptional state; for if the size and attractive nature of the Serenata did not claim more than ordinary consideration at the hands of its composer, its performance in London twelve years later—presumably with a chorus not possessing the peculiarities of the Chandos choir—would appear to have demanded some revision of its voice parts.

Nothing, however, seems to have been done in that direction—if we except a pencilled memorandum by the composer on the 1st Tenor line of "Wretched lovers," "This part in Contralt."—until about thirty years ago, when an equally rough and ready expedient was adopted by the Handel Society under the advice of Sterndale Bennett, viz.: to give the 1st Tenor line of nearly all the choruses to the Altos. It need scarcely be said, that as the range of the remaining Tenor parts coincided almost exactly with the one transferred to the Altos, the difficulties could only be regarded as mitigated, not removed.

It was plain—and it must have forced itself upon the attention of those who have directed its performance, as well as on those singers who have been condemned to wrestle with its well-nigh impossible Tenor parts—that a more radical and systematic rearrangement was required to place this work upon an equal footing with others of its class.

With this desire alone has the present edition been prepared and published.

In addition to the occasional transposition of voice parts in certain choruses, the Editor is responsible for much of the Pianoforte accompaniment, for suggested abbreviations in the Airs, and for the marks of expression throughout.

Edited by HENRY ALLON, D.D., and H. J. GAUNTLETT, Mus. Doc.

Providing Tunes, Chants, and Anthems, by the best Composers, Ancient and Modern. List of editions on application.

"Dr. Allon has done so much to promote an intelligent use of sacred music in Divine worship that we gladly call attention to his last and, as we think, most wise effort in the same direction. Having issued in the 'Congregational Psalmist' a valuable series of hymn-tunes, chants, kyries, &c., he has now published in a little pocket volume a collection of anthems intended for the use of the congregation, and not simply for the choir. The pieces, as a rule, require, in singing, a degree of musical culture somewhat greater than that required by chorals and chants, but they are, on the whole, within the reach of persons possessing a practical acquaintance with sight-singing."—The Choir.

MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Now ready.

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

CHARLES HALLÉ'S

APPENDIX TO HIS

PRACTICAL PIANOFORTE SCHOOL.

THE favour with which the "PRACTICAL PIANOFORTE SCHOOL" has been received by Professors and Students has led to the present Publication, in which the principal features of the "School" will be preserved. The "MUSICAL LIBRARY" embraces Solos and Duets, both Classical and Modern, selected for their intrinsic value, all of which are thoroughly fingered, supplemented with signs of expression and foot-notes explaining ornaments where necessary, and the use of the Pedals carefully marked. Each piece is prefaced by a page of Exercises written expressly by me, and the degree of difficulty is indicated by the letters A, B, C, D, E, and by numbers, the former corresponding with the five Sections of the "PRACTICAL PIANOFORTE SCHOOL," and the latter with the particular number in each Section.
